YANK: [Vehemently] Sure ting I do! Didn't I try to get even wit her in Southampton? Didn't I sneak on de deck and wait for her by de gangplank? I was goin' to spit in her pale mug, see! Sure, right in her pop-eyes! Dat woulda made me even, see? But no chanct. Dere was a whole army of plainclothes bulls around. Dey spotted me and gimme de bum's rush. I never seen her. But I'll git square wit her yet, you watch! [Furiously] De lousy tart! She tinks she kin get away wit moider—but not wit me! I'll fix her! I'll tink of a way!

LONG: [As disgusted as he dares to be] Ain't that why I brought yer up 'ere—to show yer? Yer been lookin' at this 'ere 'ole affair wrong. Yer been actin' an' talkin' 's if it was all a bleedin' personal matter between yer and that bloody cow. I wants to convince yer she was on'y a representative of 'er clarss. I wants to awaken yer bloody clarss consciousness. Then yer'll see it's 'er clarss ye've got to fight, not 'er alone. There's a 'ole mob of 'em like 'er, Gawd blind 'em!

YANK: [Spitting on his hands—belligerently] De more de merrier when I gits started. Bring on de gang!

LONG: Yer'll see 'em in arf a mo', when that church lets out. [He turns and sees the window display in the two stores for the first time] Blimey! Look at that, will yer? [They both walk back and stand looking in the jeweler's. Long flies into a fury] Just look at this 'ere bloomin' mess! Just look at it! Look at the bleedin' prices on 'em—more'n our 'ole bloody stokehole makes in ten voyages sweatin' in 'ell! And they—'er and 'er bloody clarss—buys 'em for toys to dangle on 'em! One of these 'ere would buy scoff for a starvin' family for a year!

YANK: Aw, cut de sob stuff! T' hell wit de starvin' family! Yuh'll be passin' de hat to me next. [With naïve admiration] Say, dem tings is pretty, huh? Bet yuh dey'd hock for a piece of change aw right. [Then turning away, bored] But, aw hell, what good are dey? Let her have 'em. Dey don't belong no more'n she does. [With a gesture of sweeping the jeweler's into oblivion] All dat don't count, get me?

LONG: [Who has moved to the furrier's—indignantly] And I s'pose this 'ere don't count neither skins of poor, 'armless animals slaughtered so as 'er and 'ers can keep their bleedin' noses warm!

YANK: [Who has been staring at something inside—with queer excitement] Take a slant at dat! Give it de once-over! Monkey fur—two t'ousand bucks! [Bewilderedly] Is dat straight goods—monkey fur? What de hell——?

LONG: [Bitterly] It's straight enuf. [With grim humor] They wouldn't bloody well pay that for a 'airy ape's skin—no, nor for the 'ole livin' ape with all 'is 'ead, and body, and soul thrown in!

YANK: [Clenching his fists, his face growing pale with rage as if the skin in the window were a personal insult] Trowin' it up in my face! Christ! I'll fix her!

LONG: [Excitedly] Church is out. 'Ere they come, the bleedin' swine. [After a glance at Yank's lowering face—uneasily] Easy goes, Comrade. Keep yer bloomin' temper. Remember force defeats itself. It ain't our weapon. We must impress our demands through peaceful means—the votes of the on-marching proletarians of the bloody world!

YANK: [With abysmal contempt] Votes, hell! Votes is a joke, see? Votes for women! Let dem do it!

LONG: [Still more uneasily] Calm, now. Treat 'em wiv the proper contempt. Observe the bleedin' parasites but 'old yer 'orses.

YANK: [Angrily] Git away from me! Yuh're yellow, dat's what. Force, dat's me! De punch, dat's me every time, see!

voices: Dear Doctor Caiaphas! He is so sincere! What was the sermon? I dozed off.

About the radicals, my dear—and the false doctrines that are being preached.

We must organize a hundred per cent American bazaar.

And let everyone contribute one one-hundredth per cent of their income tax.

What an original idea!

We can devote the proceeds to rehabilitating the veil of the temple.

But that has been done so many times.

YANK: [Glaring from one to the other of them—with an insulting snort of scorn] Huh! Huh!

[Without seeming to see him, they make wide detours to avoid the spot where he stands in the middle of the sidewalk]

LONG: [Frightenedly] Keep yer bloomin' mouth shut, I tells yer.

YANK: [Viciously] G'wan! Tell it to Sweeney! [He swaggers away and deliberately lurches into a top-hatted Gentleman, then glares at him pugnaciously] Say, who d'yuh tink yuh're bumpin'? Tink yuh own de oith?

GENTLEMAN: [Coldly and affectedly] I beg your pardon. [He has not looked at Yank and passes on without a glance, leaving him bewildered]

LONG: [Rushing up and grabbing Yank's arm] 'Ere! Come away! This wasn't what I meant. Yer'll ave the bloody coppers down on us.

YANK: [Savagely—giving him a push that sends him sprawling] G'wan!

LONG: [Picks himself up—hysterically] I'll pop orf then. This ain't what I meant. And whatever 'appens, yer can't blame me. [He slinks off left]

YANK: T' hell wit youse! [He approaches a Lady -with a vicious grin and a smirking wink] Hello, Kiddo. How's every little ting? Got anything on for tonight? I know an old boiler down to de docks we kin crawl into. [The Lady stalks by without a look, without a change of pace. Yank turns to othersinsultingly] Holy smokes, what a mug! Go hide yuhself before de horses shy at yuh. Gee, pipe de heinie on dat one! Say, youse, yuh look like de stoin of a ferryboat. Paint and powder! All dolled up to kill! Yuh look like stiffs laid out for de boneyard! Aw, g'wan, de lot of youse! Yuh give me de eyeache. Yuh don't belong, get me! Look at me, why don't youse dare? I belong, dat's me! [Pointing to a sky-scraper across the street which is in process of construction—with bravado] See dat building goin' up dere? See de steel work? Steel, dat's me! Youse guys live on it and tink yuh're somep'n. But I'm in it, see! I'm de hoistin' engine dat makes it go up! I'm it-de inside and bottom of it! Sure! I'm steel and steam and smoke and de rest of it! It moves-speed-twenty-five stories up-and me at de top and bottom-movin'! Youse simps don't move. Yuh're on'y dolls I winds up to see 'm spin. Yuh're de garbage, get me-de leavins-de ashes we dump over de side! Now, what 'a' yuh gotta say? But as they seem neither to see nor hear him, he flies into a fury] Bums! Pigs! Tarts! Bitches! [He turns in a rage on the Men, bumping viciously into them but not jarring them the least bit. Rather it is he who recoils after each collision. He keeps growling] Git off de oith! G'wan, yuh bum! Look where yuh're goin', can't yuh? Git outa here! Fight, why don't yuh? Put up yer mits! Don't be a dog! Fight or I'll knock yuh dead! [But, without seeming to see him, they all answer with mechanical affected politeness:] I beg your pardon.

[Then, at a cry from one of the Women, they all scurry to the furrier's window]

THE WOMAN: [Ecstatically, with a gasp of delight] Monkey fur! [The whole crowd of Men and Women chorus after her in the same tone of affected delight] Monkey fur!

YANK: [With a jerk of his head back on his shoulders, as if he had received a punch full in the face—raging] I see yuh, all in white! I see yuh, yuh white-faced tart, yuh! Hairy ape, huh? I'll hairy ape yuh!

[He bends down and grips at the street curbing as if to pluck it out and hurl it. Foiled in this, snarling with passion, he leaps to the lamppost on the corner and tries to pull it up for a club. Just at that moment a bus is heard rumbling up. A fat, high-hatted, spatted Gentleman runs out from the side street. He calls out plaintively:

GENTLEMAN: Bus! Bus! Stop there! [And runs full tilt into the bending, straining Yank, who is bowled off his balance]

YANK: [Seeing a fight—with a roar of joy as he springs to his feet] At last! Bus, huh? I'll bust yuh! [He lets drive a terrific swing, his fist landing full on the fat Gentleman's face. But the Gentleman stands unmoved as if nothing had happened]

GENTLEMAN: I beg your pardon. [Then irritably] You have made me lose my bus. [He claps his hands and begins to scream:] Officer! Officer!

[Many police whistles shrill out on the instant and a whole platoon of Policemen rush in on Yank from all sides. He tries to fight but is clubbed to the pavement and fallen upon. The Crowd at the window have not moved or noticed this disturbance. The clanging gong of the patrol wagon approaches with a clamoring din]

CURTAIN

SCENE VI.

Night of the following day. A row of cells in the prison on Blackwell's Island. The cells extend back diagonally from right front to left rear. They do not stop, but disappear in the dark background as if they ran on, numberless, into infinity. One electric bulb from the low ceiling of the narrow corridor sheds its light through the heavy steel bars of the cell at the extreme front and reveals part of the interior.

Yank can be seen within, crouched on the edge of his cot in the attitude of Rodin's "The Thinker." His face is spotted with black and blue bruises. A blood-stained bandage is wrapped around his head.

YANK: [Suddenly starting as if awakening from a dream, reaches out and shakes the bars—aloud to himself, wonderingly] Steel. Dis is de Zoo, huh?

[A burst of hard, barking laughter comes from the unseen Occupants of the cells, runs back down the tier, and abruptly ceases] voices: [Mockingly] The Zoo? That's a new name for this coop—a damn good name!

Steel, eh? You said a mouthful. This is the old iron house.

Who is that boob talkin'?

He's the bloke they brung in out of his head. The bulls had beat him up fierce.

YANK: [Dully] I musta been dreamin'. I tought I was in a cage at de Zoo—but de apes don't talk, do dey?

VOICES: [With mocking laughter] You're in a cage aw right.

A coop!

A pen!

A sty!

A kennel!

[Hard laughter—a pause]

Say, guy! Who are you? No, never mind lying. What are you?

Yes, tell us your sad story. What's your game? What did they jug yuh for?

YANK: [Dully] I was a fireman—stokin' on de liners. [Then with sudden rage, rattling his cell bars] I'm a hairy ape, get me? And I'll bust youse all in de jaw if yuh don't lay off kiddin' me.

voices: Huh! You're a hard boiled duck, ain't youse!

When you spit, it bounces!

[Laughter]

Aw, can it. He's a regular guy. Ain't you?

What did he say he was—a ape?

YANK: [Defiantly] Sure ting! Ain't dat what youse all are—apes?

[A silence. Then a furious rattling of bars from down the corridor] voices: Ssshh! Nix!

A VOICE: [Thick with rage] I'll show yuh who's a ape, yuh bum!

Can de noise!

Piano!

You'll have the guard down on us!

YANK: [Scornfully] De guard? Yuh mean de keeper, don't yuh?

[Angry exclamations from all the cells]

VOICE: [Placatingly] Aw, don't pay no attention to him. He's off his nut from the beatin'-up he got. Say, you guy! We're waitin' to hear what they landed you for—or ain't yuh tellin'?

YANK: Sure, I'll tell youse. Sure! Why de hell not? On'y—youse won't get me. Nobody gets me but me, see? I started to tell de Judge and all he says was: "Toity days to tink it over." Tink it over! Christ, dat's all I been doin' for weeks! [After a pause] I was tryin' to git even wit someone, see?—someone dat done me doit.

voices: [Cynically] De old stuff, I bet. Your goil, huh?

Give yuh the double-cross, huh?

That's them every time!

Did yuh beat up de odder guy?

YANK: [Disgustedly] Aw, yuh're all wrong! Sure dere was a skoit in it—but not what youse mean, not dat old tripe. Dis was a new kind of skoit. She was dolled up all in white—in de stokehole. I tought she was a ghost. Sure.

[A pause]

VOICES: [Whispering] Gee, he's still nutty. Let him rave. It's fun listenin'.

YANK: [Unheeding—groping in his thoughts] Her hands—dey was skinny and white like dey wasn't real but painted on somep'n. Dere was a million miles from me to her—twenty-five knots a hour. She was like some dead ting de cat brung in. Sure, dat's what. She didn't belong. She belonged in de window of a toy store, or on de top of a garbage can, see! Sure! [He breaks out angrily] But would yuh believe it, she had de noive to do me doit. She lamped me like she was seein' somep'n broke loose from de menagerie. Christ, yuh'd oughter seen her eyes! [He rattles the bars of his cell furiously] But I'll get back at her yet, you watch! And if I can't find her I'll take it out on de gang she runs wit. I'm wise to where dey hangs out now. I'll show her who belongs! I'll show her who's in de move and who ain't. You watch my smoke!

VOICES: [Serious and joking] Dat's de talkin'!

Take her for all she's got!

What was this dame, anyway? Who was she, eh?

YANK: I dunno. First cabin stiff. Her old man's a millionaire, dey says—name of Douglas.

voices: Douglas? That's the president of the Steel Trust, I bet.

Sure. I seen his mug in de papers.

He's filthy with dough.

VOICE: Hey, feller, take a tip from me. If you want to get back at that dame, you better join the Wobblies. You'll get some action then.

YANK: Wobblies? What de hell's dat?

VOICE: Ain't you ever heard of the I. W. W.?

YANK: Naw. What is it?

voice: A gang of blokes—a tough gang. I been readin' about 'em today in the paper. The guard give me the Sunday Times. There's a long spiel about 'em. It's from a speech made in the Senate by a guy named Senator Queen. [He is in the cell next to Yank's. There is a rustling of paper] Wait'll I see if I got light enough and I'll read you. Listen. [He reads:] "There is a menace existing in this country today which threatens the vitals of our fair Republic—as foul a menace against the very lifeblood of the American Eagle as was the foul conspiracy of Catiline against the eagles of ancient Rome!"

VOICE: [Disgustedly] Aw, hell! Tell him to salt de tail of dat eagle!

VOICE: [Reading:] "I refer to that devil's brew of rascals, jailbirds, murderers and cutthroats who libel all honest working men by calling themselves the Industrial Workers of the World; but in the light of their nefarious plots, I call them the Industrious Wreckers of the World!"

YANK: [With vengeful satisfaction] Wreckers, dat's de right dope! Dat belongs! Me for dem!

VOICE: Ssshh! [Reading:] "This flendish organization is a foul ulcer on the fair body of our Democracy—"

VOICE: Democracy, hell! Give him the boid, fellers—the raspberry! [They do]

VOICE: Ssshh! [Reading:] "Like Cato I say to this Senate, the I. W. W. must be destroyed! For they represent an ever-present dagger pointed at the heart of the greatest nation the world has ever known, where all men are born free and equal, with equal opportunities to all, where the Founding Fathers have guaranteed to each one happiness, where Truth, Honor, Liberty, Justice, and the Brotherhood of Man are a religion absorbed with one's mother milk, taught at our father's knee, sealed, signed, and stamped in the glorious Constitution of these United States!"

[A perfect storm of hisses, catcalls, boos, and hard laughter]

voices: [Scornfully] Hurrah for de Fort' of July!

Pass de hat!

Liberty!

Justice! Honor!

Opportunity!

Brotherhood!

I'll git the hose.

ALL: [With abysmal scorn] Aw, hell!

VOICE: Give the Queen Senator guy the bark!

All togedder now—one—two—three——

[A terrific chorus of barking and yapping]
GUARD: [From a distance] Quiet there, youse—or

[The noise subsides]

YANK: [With growling rage] I'd like to catch dat senator guy alone for a second. I'd loin him some trute!

VOICE: Ssshh! Here's where he gits down to cases on the Wobblies. [Reads:] "They plot with fire in one hand and dynamite in the other. They stop not before murder to gain their ends, nor at the outraging of defenseless womanhood. They would tear down society, put the lowest scum in the seats of the mighty, turn Almighty God's revealed plan for the world topsy-turvy, and make of our sweet and lovely civilization a shambles, a desolation where man, God's masterpiece, would soon degenerate back to the ape!"

voice: [To Yank] Hey, you guy. There's your ape stuff again.

YANK: [With a growl of fury] I got him. So dey blow up tings, do they? Dey turn tings round, do dey? Hey, lend me dat paper, will yuh?

VOICE: Sure. Give it to him. On'y keep it to yourself, see? We don't wanter listen to no more of that slop.

VOICE: Here you are. Hide it under your mattress. YANK: [Reaching out] Tanks. I can't read much but I kin manage. [He sits, the paper in the hand at his side, in the attitude of Rodin's "The Thinker." A pause. Several snores from down the corridor. Suddenly Yank jumps to his feet with a furious groan as if some appalling thought had crashed on him-bewilderedly] Sure-her old man-president of de Steel Trust-makes half de steel in de world -steel-where I thought I belonged-drivin' trou -movin'-in dat-to make her-and cage me in for her to spit on! Christ! [He shakes the bars of his cell door till the whole tier trembles. Irritated, protesting exclamations from those awakened or trying to get to sleep] He made dis-dis cage! Steel! It don't belong, dat's what! Cages, cells, locks, bolts, bars-dat's what it means!-holdin' me down with him at de top! But I'll drive trou! Fire, dat melts it! I'll be fire—under de heap—fire dat never goes out -hot as hell-breakin' out in de night-

[While he has been saying this last he has shaken his cell door to a clanging accompaniment. As he comes to the "breakin' out" he seizes one bar with both hands and, putting his two feet up against the others so that his position is parallel to the floor like a monkey's, he gives a great wrench backwards. The bar bends like a licorice stick under his tremendous strength. Just at this moment the Prison Guard rushes in, dragging a hose behind him]

GUARD: [Angrily] I'll loin youse bums to wake me up! [Sees Yank] Hello, it's you, huh? Got the D. Ts., hey? Well, I'll cure 'em. I'll drown your snakes for yuh! [Noticing the bar] Hell, look at dat bar bended! On'y a bug is strong enough for dat!

YANK: [Glaring at him] Or a hairy ape, yuh big yellow bum! Look out! Here I come! [He grabs another bar]

GUARD: [Scared now—yelling off left] Toin de hose on, Ben!—full pressure! And call de others—and a straitjacket!

[The curtain is falling. As it hides Yank from view, there is a splattering smash as the stream of water hits the steel of Yank's cell]

CURTAIN

SCENE VII.

Nearly a month later. An I. W. W. local near the waterfront, showing the interior of a front room on the ground floor, and the street outside. Moonlight on the narrow street, buildings massed in black shadow. The interior of the room, which is general assembly room, office, and reading room, resembles some dingy settlement boys' club. A desk and high stool are in one corner. A table with paper, stacks of pamphlets, chairs about it, is at center. The whole is decidedly cheap, banal, commonplace, and unmysterious as a room could well be.

The Secretary is perched on the stool making entries in a large ledger. An eye shade casts his face into shadows. Eight or ten Men, Longshoremen, Iron Workers, and the like, are grouped about the table. Two are playing checkers. One is writing a letter. Most of them are smoking pipes. A big signboard is on the wall at the rear, "Industrial Workers of the World—Local No. 57." Yank comes down the street outside. He is dressed as in Scene Five. He moves cautiously, mysteriously. He comes to a point opposite the door; tiptoes softly up to it, listens, is impressed by the silence within, knocks carefully, as if he were guessing at the password to some secret rite. Listens. No answer. Knocks again a bit louder. No answer. Knocks impatiently, much louder.

SECRETARY: [Turning around on his stool] What the hell is that—someone knocking? [Shouts:] Come in, why don't you?

[All the Men in the room look up. Yank opens the door slowly, gingerly, as if afraid of an ambush. He looks around for the secret doors, mystery, is taken aback by the commonplaceness of the room and the Men in it, thinks he may have gotten in the wrong place, then sees the signboard on the wall and is reassured]

YANK: [Blurts out:] Hello. MEN: [Reservedly] Hello.

YANK: [More easily] I thought I'd bumped into de wrong dump.

SECRETARY: [Scrutinizing him carefully] Maybe you have. Are you a member?

YANK: Naw, not yet. Dat's what I come for—to join.

SECRETARY: That's easy. What's your job—long-shore?

YANK: Naw. Fireman—stoker on de liners.

SECRETARY: [With satisfaction] Welcome to our city. Glad to know you people are waking up at last. We haven't got many members in your line.

YANK: Naw. Dey're all dead to de woild.

SECRETARY: Well, you can help to wake 'em. What's your name? I'll make out your card.

YANK: [Confused] Name? Lemme tink.

SECRETARY: [Sharply] Don't you know your own name?

YANK: Sure; but I been just Yank for so long—Bob, dat's it—Bob Smith.

SECRETARY: [Writing] Robert Smith. [Fills out the rest of card] Here you are. Cost you half a dollar. YANK: Is dat all—four bits? Dat's easy.

[Gives the Secretary the money]

SECRETARY: [Throwing it in drawer] Thanks. Well, make yourself at home. No introductions needed. There's literature on the table. Take some of those pamphlets with you to distribute aboard ship. They may bring results. Sow the seed, only go about it right. Don't get caught and fired. We got plenty out of work. What we need is men who can hold their jobs—and work for us at the same time.

YANK: Sure. [But he still stands, embarrassed and uneasy]

SECRETARY: [Looking at him—curiously] What did you knock for? Think we had a coon in uniform to open doors?

YANK: Naw. I tought it was locked—and dat yuh'd wanter give me the once-over trou a peephole or somep'n to see if I was right.

SECRETARY: [Alert and suspicious but with an easy laugh] Think we were running a crap game? That door is never locked. What put that in your nut?

YANK: [With a knowing grin, convinced that this is all camouflage, a part of the secrecy] Dis burg is full of bulls, ain't it?

SECRETARY: [Sharply] What have the cops got to do with us? We're breaking no laws.

YANK: [With a knowing wink] Sure. Youse wouldn't for woilds. Sure. I'm wise to dat.

SECRETARY: You seem to be wise to a lot of stuff none of us knows about.

YANK: [With another wink] Aw, dat's aw right, see? [Then made a bit resentful by the suspicious glances from all sides] Aw, can it! Youse needn't put me trou de toid degree. Can't youse see I belong? Sure! I'm reg'lar. I'll stick, get me? I'll shoot de woiks for youse. Dat's why I wanted to join in.

SECRETARY: [Breezily, feeling him out] That's the right spirit. Only are you sure you understand what you've joined? It's all plain and above board; still, some guys get a wrong slant on us. [Sharply] What's your notion of the purpose of the I. W. W.?

YANK: Aw, I know all about it.

SECRETARY: [Sarcastically] Well, give us some of your valuable information.

YANK: [Cunningly] I know enough not to speak outa my toin. [Then resentfully again] Aw, say! I'm reg'lar. I'm wise to de game. I know yuh got to watch your step wit a stranger. For all youse know, I might be a plain-clothes dick, or somep'n, dat's what yuh're thinkin', huh? Aw, forget it! I belong, see? Ask any guy down to de docks if I don't.

SECRETARY: Who said you didn't?

YANK: After I'm 'nitiated, I'll show yuh.

SECRETARY: [Astounded] Initiated? There's no initiation.

YANK: [Disappointed] Ain't there no password—no grip nor nothin'?

SECRETARY: What'd you think this is—the Elks—or the Black Hand?

YANK: De Elks, hell! De Black Hand, dey're ø lot of yellow backstickin' Ginees. Naw. Dis is a man's gang, ain't it?

SECRETARY: You said it! That's why we stand on two feet in the open. We got no secrets.

YANK: [Surprised but admiringly] Yuh mean to say yuh always run wide open—like dis?

SECRETARY: Exactly.

YANK: Den yuh sure got your noive wit youse! SECRETARY: [Sharply] Just what was it made you want to join us? Come out with that straight.

YANK: Yuh call me? Well, I got noive, too! Here's my hand. Yuh wanter blow tings up, don't yuh? Well. dat's me! I belong!

SECRETARY: [With pretended carelessness] You mean change the unequal conditions of society by legitimate direct action—or with dynamite?

YANK: Dynamite! Blow it offen de oith—steel—all de cages—all de factories, steamers, buildings, jails—de Steel Trust and all dat makes it go.

SECRETARY: So—that's your idea, eh? And did you have any special job in that line you wanted to propose to us? [He makes a sign to the Men, who get up cautiously one by one and group behind Yank]

YANK: [Boldly] Sure, I'll come out wit it. I'll show youse I'm one of de gang. Dere's dat millionaire guy, Douglas——

SECRETARY: President of the Steel Trust, you mean? Do you want to assassinate him?

YANK: Naw, dat don't get yuh nothin'. I mean blow up de factory, de woiks, where he makes de steel. Dat's what I'm after—to blow up de steel, knock all de steel in de woild up to de moon. Dat'll fix tings! [Eagerly, with a touch of bravado] I'll do it by me lonesome! I'll show yuh! Tell me where his woiks is, how to git there, all de dope. Gimme de stuff, de old butter—and watch me do de rest! Watch de smoke and see it move! I don't give a damn if dey nab me—long as it's done! I'll soive life for it—and give 'em de laugh! [Half to himself] And I'll write her a letter and tell her de hairy ape done it. Dat'll square tings.

SECRETARY: [Stepping away from Yank] Very interesting.

[He gives a signal. The Men, huskies all, throw themselves on Yank and before he knows it they have his legs and arms pinioned. But he is too flabbergasted to make a struggle, anyway. They feel him over for weapons

MAN: No gat, no knife. Shall we give him what's what and put the boots to him?

SECRETARY: No. He isn't worth the trouble we'd get into. He's too stupid. [He comes closer and laughs mockingly in Yank's face] Ho-ho! By God, this is the biggest joke they've put up on us yet. Hey, you Joke! Who sent you—Burns or Pinkerton? No, by God, you're such a bonehead I'll bet you're in the Secret Service! Well, you dirty spy, you rotten agent provocator, you can go back and tell whatever skunk is paying you blood-money for betraying your brothers that he's wasting his coin. You couldn't catch a cold. And tell him that all he'll ever get on us, or ever has got, is just his own sneaking plots that he's framed up to put us in jail. We are what our manifesto says we are, neither more nor less—and we'll give him a copy of that any time he calls. And as for you—— [He glares scornfully at Yank, who is sunk in an oblivious stupor] Oh, hell, what's the use of talking? You're a brainless ape.

YANK: [Aroused by the word to fierce but futile struggles] What's dat, yuh Sheeny bum, yuh! SECRETARY: Throw him out, boys.

[In spite of his struggles, this is done with gusto and éclat. Propelled by several parting kicks, Yank lands sprawling in the middle of the narrow cobbled street. With a growl he starts to get up and storm the closed door, but stops bewildered by the confusion in his brain, pathetically impotent. He sits there, brooding, in as near to the attitude of Rodin's "Thinker" as he can get in his position

YANK: [Bitterly] So dem boids don't tink I belong, neider. Aw, to hell wit 'em! Dey're in de wrong pew -de same old bull-soapboxes and Salvation Army -no guts! Cut out an hour offen de job a day and make me happy! Gimme a dollar more a day and make me happy! Tree squares a day, and cauliflowers in de front yard-ekal rights-a woman and kids—a lousy vote—and I'm all fixed for Jesus, huh? Aw, hell! What does dat get yuh? Dis ting's in your inside, but it ain't your belly. Feedin' your facesinkers and coffee—dat don't touch it. It's way down -at de bottom. Yuh can't grab it, and yuh can't stop it. It moves, and everything moves. It stops and de whole woild stops. Dat's me now-I don't tick. see?-I'm a busted Ingersoll, dat's what. Steel was me, and I owned de woild. Now I ain't steel, and de woild owns me. Aw, hell! I can't see—it's all dark. get me? It's all wrong! [He turns a bitter mocking face up like a ape gibbering at the moon] Say, youse up dere, Man in de Moon, yuh look so wise, gimme de answer, huh? Slip me de inside dope, de information right from de stable—where do I get off at. huh?

A POLICEMAN: [Who has come up the street in time to hear this last—with grim humor] You'll get off at the station, you boob, if you don't get up out of that and keep movin'.

YANK: [Looking up at him—with a hard, bitter laugh] Sure! Lock me up! Put me in a cage! Dat's de on'y answer yuh know. G'wan, lock me up!

POLICEMAN: What you been doin'?

YANK: Enuf to gimme life for! I was born, see? Sure, dat's de charge. Write it in de blotter. I was born, get me?

POLICEMAN: [Jocosely] God pity your old woman! [Then matter-of-fact] But I've no time for kidding. You're soused, I'd run you in but it's too long a walk to the station. Come on now, get up, or I'll fan your ears with this club. Beat it now! [He hauls Yank to his feet]

YANK: [In a vague mocking tone] Say, where do I go from here?

POLICEMAN: [Giving him a push—with a grin, indifferently] Go to hell.

SCENE VIII.

Twilight of the next day. The monkey house at the Zoo. One spot of clear gray light falls on the front of one cage so that the interior can be seen. The other cages are vague, shrouded in shadow from which chatterings pitched in a conversational tone can be heard. On the one cage a sign from which the word "gorilla" stands out. The gigantic Animal himself is seen squatting on his haunches on a bench in much the same attitute as Rodin's "Thinker."

Yank enters from the left. Immediately a chorus of angry chattering and screeching breaks out. The Gorilla turns his eyes but makes no sound or move.

YANK: [With a hard, bitter laugh] Welcome to your city, huh? Hail, hail, de gang's all here! [At the sound of his voice the chattering dies away into an attentive silence. Yank walks up to the Gorilla's cage and, leaning over the railing, stares in at its occupant, who stares back at him, silent and motionless. There is a pause of dead stillness. Then Yank begins to talk in a friendly confidential tone, halfmockingly, but with a deep undercurrent of sympathy] Say, yuh're some hard-lookin' guy, ain't yuh? I seen lots of tough nuts dat de gang called gorillas, but yuh're de foist real one I ever seen. Some chest yuh got, and shoulders, and dem arms and mits! I bet yuh got a punch in eider fist dat'd knock 'em all silly! [This with genuine admiration. The Gorilla, as if he understood, stands upright, swelling out his chest and pounding on it with his fist. Yank grins sympathetically] Sure, I get yuh. Yuh challenge de whole woild, huh? Yuh got what I was sayin' even if yuh muffed de woids. [Then bitterness creeping in] And why wouldn't yuh get me? Ain't we both members of de same club—de Hairy Apes? [They stare at each other-a pause-then Yank goes on slowly and bitterly] So yuh're what she seen when she looked at me, de white-faced tart! I was you to her, get me? On'y outa de cage-broke out-free to moider her, see? Sure! Dat's what she tought. She wasn't wise dat I was in a cage, too-worser'n yours -sure-a damn sight-'cause you got some chanct to bust loose—but me— [He grows confused] Aw, hell! It's wrong, ain't it? [A pause] I s'pose yuh wanter know what I'm doin' here, huh? I been warmin' a bench down to de Battery-ever since last night. Sure. I seen de sun come up. Dat was pretty, too—all red and pink and green. I was lookin' at de skyscrapers-steel-and all de ships comin' in, sailin' out, all over de oith—and dey was steel, too. De sun was warm, dey wasn't no clouds, and dere was a breeze blowin'. Sure, it was great stuff. I got it aw right-what Paddy said about dat bein' de right dope-on'y I couldn't get in it, see? I couldn't belong in dat. It was over my head. And I kept tinkin'—and den I beat it up here to see what youse was like. And I waited till dey was all gone to git yuh alone. Say, how d'yuh feel sittin' in dat pen all de time, havin' to stand for 'em comin' and starin' at yuh-de white-faced, skinny tarts and de boobs what marry 'em-makin' fun of yuh, laughin' at yuh, gittin' scared of yuh-damn 'em! [He pounds on the rail with his fist. The Gorilla rattles the bars of his cage and snarls. All the other monkeys set up an angry chattering in the darkness. Yank goes on excitedly] Sure! Dat's de way it hits me, too. On'y yuh're lucky, see? Yuh don't belong wit 'em and yuh know it. But me, I belong wit 'em-but I don't, see? Dey don't belong wit me, dat's what. Get me? Tinkin' is hard—— [He passes one hand across his forehead with a painful gesture. The Gorilla growls impatiently. Yank goes on gropingly It's dis way, what I'm drivin' at. Youse can sit and dope dream in de past, green woods, de jungle, and de rest of it. Den yuh belong and dey don't. Den yuh kin laugh at 'em, see? Yuh're de champ of de woild. But me-I ain't got no past to tink in, nor nothin' dat's comin', on'y what's now-and dat don't belong. Sure, you're de best off! Yuh can't tink, can yuh? Yuh can't talk neider. But I kin make a bluff at talkin' and tinkin'-a'most git away wit it-a'most! —and dat's where de joker comes in. [He laughs] I ain't on oith and I ain't in heaven, get me? I'm in de middle tryin' to separate 'em, takin' all de woist punches from bot' of 'em. Maybe dat's what dev call hell, huh? But you, yuh're at de bottom. You belong! Sure! Yuh're de on'y one in de woild dat does, yuh lucky stiff! [The Gorilla growls proudly] And dat's why dey gotter put yuh in a cage, see? [The Gorilla roars angrily] Sure! Yuh get me. It beats it when you try to tink it or talk it—it's way down-deep-behind-you 'n' me we feel it. Sure! Bot' members of dis club! [He laughs—then in a savage tone] What de hell! T'hell wit it! A little action, dat's our meat! Dat belongs! Knock 'em down and keep bustin' 'em till dey croaks yuh wit a gatwit steel! Sure! Are yuh game? Dey've looked at youse, ain't dey-in a cage? Wanter git even? Wanter wind up like a sport 'stead of croakin' slow in dere? [The Gorilla roars an emphatic affirmative. Yank goes on with a sort of furious exaltation] Sure! Yuh're reg'lar. Yuh'll stick to de finish! Me 'n' you, huh?-bot' members of this club! We'll put up one last star bout dat'll knock 'em offen deir seats! Dey'll have to make de cages stronger after we're trou! [The Gorilla is straining at his bars, growling, hopping from one foot to the other. Yank takes a jimmy from under his coat and forces the lock on the cage door. He throws this open] Pardon from de governor! Step out and shake hands! I'll take yuh for a walk down Fif' Avenoo. We'll knock 'em offen de oith and croak wit de band playin'. Come on, Brother. [The Gorilla scrambles gingerly out of his cage. Goes to Yank and stands looking at him. Yank keeps his mocking tone—holds out his hand] Shake-de secret grip of our order. [Something, the tone of mockery, perhaps, suddenly enrages the Animal. With a spring he wraps his huge arms around Yank in a murderous hug. There is a crackling snap of crushed ribs—a gasping cry, still mocking, from Yank] Hey, I didn't say kiss me! [The Gorilla lets the crushed body slip to the floor; stands over it uncertainly, considering; then picks it up, throws it in the cage, shuts the door, and shuffles off menacingly into the darkness at left. A great uproar of frightened chattering and whimpering comes from the other cages. Then Yank moves, groaning, opening his eyes, and there is silence. He mutters painfully:] Say—dey oughter match him—wit Zyb-szko. He got me, aw right. I'm trou. Even him didn't tink I belonged. [Then, with sudden passionate despair] Christ, where do I get off at? Where do I fit in? [Checking himself as suddenly] Aw, what de hell! No squawkin', see! No quittin', get me! Croak wit your boots on! [He grabs hold of the bars of the cage and hauls himself painfully to his feet—looks around him bewilderedly—forces a mocking laugh] In de cage, huh? [In the strident tones of a circus barker] Ladies and gents, step forward and take a slant at de one and only—[His voice weakening]—one and original—Hairy Ape from de wilds of—

[He slips in a heap on the floor and dies. The monkeys set up a chattering, whimpering wail. And, perhaps, the Hairy Ape at last belongs]

Laurence Stallings • Maxwell Anderson

(1894----)

aurence Stallings will be remembered in the theatre chiefly for What Price Glory?, the best modern war play in the English language. The rest of his work in the field of playwriting was not notably successful. After writing What Price Glory? with Maxwell Anderson, in 1924, he collaborated with him on two historical romances. The earlier of these, First Flight (1925), was a mild treatment of an adventurous episode in Andrew Jackson's romantic life; the other, The Buccaneer, revived the career of the swashbuckling pirate Henry Morgan. Next, Stallings turned his attention to musical drama, contributing texts to the opera Deep River (1926) and to the musical melodrama Rainbow (1928). He also dramatized Hemingway's war novel A Farewell to Arms, which was, however, more successful on the screen than on the stage; and he wrote the libretto for a lavish musical spectacle, Virginia, in 1937. A tribute to the United States Marines, The Streets Are Guarded (1944) proved too mystical and confusing. It was only as the scenarist of two important Hollywood films, The Big Parade and Old Ironsides, that Stallings won prominence comparable to that which What Price Glory? earned for him.

Stallings was born in Macon, Georgia, and attended Wake Forest College in North Carolina. He became a reporter in Atlanta, and one of his assignments, an interview intended to promote enlistments to the United States Marines, in 1917, proved decisive in his career. After writing his piece on the Marines, he himself decided to join. When America came to the rescue of the Allies, he saw heavy action in France and earned a captaincy. He lost a leg in battle at Château-Thierry and spent many months in a military hospital. Returning to civilian life, he resumed his journalistic career but contemplated entering the teaching profession. Instead, he found a job with the New York World-first as secondstring drama critic and then as book reviewer-and published a novel, Plumes, about his war experi-

Maxwell Anderson was then an editorial writer on the World, and the two men decided to collaborate on plays. When the question of a subject was discussed, Stallings remembered his war experiences, and the result was What Price Glory? (1924). The First World War was still a topic of considerable interest to the public, and the play was only one of several trenchant reminiscences, among which were such notable novels as John Dos Passos' Three Soldiers and Stallings' own Plumes. But the popularity of the subject alone could not have assured What Price Glory? its extraordinary success.

By judiciously combining robust comedy with the muck and grime of modern warfare, Stallings and Anderson created pungent theatre. The comic matter was accentuated with colloquial speech that bristled with the "high-astounding" oaths of native warriors. The broadly conceived characters bore the stamp of reality; the soldiers were no Galahads fighting for glory, although they were courageous and had a rough-hewn nobility. Although the authors indulged in some romantic, masculine swagger and contented themselves with only random commentary, they drew an unflattering picture of military life such as had never before been seen on an American stage Most playgoers agreed that Alexander Woollcott, reviewing the play in the New York Evening Sun, did not greatly exaggerate when he wrote that "in the tremendous irony of the comedy and in the sardonic laughter which fills its every scene, there is more said about the war than in all the editorials on the subject which, if placed end to end, would reach nowhere."

What Price Glory? became one of the most successful productions of the American stage. The performances of Louis Wolheim and William Boyd as rivals for the favors of the eternal woman and French camp follower Charmaine provided the breeziest entertainment the American public had yet seen; the language was the freest it had yet heard. The mood of cynicism was in vogue at the time, and playgoers were delighted by the satire on brass hats, "thirty-day-wonder lieutenants," and "the band of Gideons from Headquarters bringing more of that world safe for democracy slush." The cry of Lieutenant Moore, "What price glory now?" echoed through the period of postwar disillusionment. The play banished the romantic treatment of fighting that had prevailed in the American theatre after every previous war. Recalling the eventful Arthur Hopkins production on September 3, 1924, after a decade of playgoing, Burns Mantle wrote in the first edition of this Treasury of the Theatre: "One of the famous first nights in the theatre going history of New York is that on which What Price Glory? was introduced to a slightly startled audience. For the first time in theatre history a war play was presented with something resembling literal realism, and spoken with more regard for a reasonable verisimilitude than for the sensibilities of convention-protected auditors. The shock was a little severe, particularly to the ladies, but it gave way in the end to such cheering as the theatre does not often hear. That night a new blow was struck for freedom of speech in the drama."

Since war is hardly a novel experience for the human race, the subject has been familiar in the theatre ever since Aeschylus wrote The Persians, in 472 B.C., eight years after the battle of Salamis. In the opinion of many, the greatest antiwar play is still Euripides' The Trojan Women, written in 415 B.C., a year after the civilized Athenians destroyed a neutral island and exterminated the entire male population. These and other classic plays belong to a high tragic tradition that would have seemed remote to the American public. Even the example of Shakespeare, who brought comic, as well as antiheroic, matter into his chronicles but invested war with majesty, could not have satisfied the "debunkers" of the nineteen-twenties. At the same time, however, they could not count upon much public response to the unrelieved bitterness of the plays engendered by the First World War in Continental Europe, especially in Germany. America had not experienced war on its own soil, nor had it tasted defeat. The mood of the American playgoer favored a play of intermediate quality, neither majestic, on the one hand, nor notably embittered, on the other. Stallings and Anderson wrote What Price Glory? with an instinctive awareness of the mood of the nation that disavowed Woodrow Wilson's wartime ideals and regarded our embroilment in the European war as an error.

It was only a decade later that American antiwar plays became less "sophisticated" than impassioned, less cynical than rebellious; and this was because war was no longer viewed as something experienced in the past but as an imminent possibility. The altered mood was reflected in Irwin Shaw's Bury the Dead (1936), in which a number of soldiers killed in a new war refuse to be buried and are joined by living soldiers in their protest against a society that breeds both poverty and armed conflict. In the same year appeared Paul Green's Johnny Johnson, whose pacifist hero is confined to an asylum after an attempt to make the nations lay down their arms, and Robert Sherwood's Idiot's Delight, which whipped up much comic complication but without losing sight of its bitter point that the only genuine internationalists in the world were the munitions manufacturers. When the protests went out of fashion with the start of the Second World War. they were replaced by rueful yet heroic plays-Robert Sherwood's There Shall Be No Night (1940) and Maxwell Anderson's The Eve of St. Mark (1942). Anderson, it is true, tried to combine heroic and antiheroic moods in his next play, Storm Operation, but without success. The first war play he wrote remained the best, and it probably would not have been written with such zest at any other time than the early 'twenties.

What Price Glory? has often been discussed as an "antiwar" play. It was so regarded by most of its admirers in the nineteen-twenties. It was criticized in the nineteen-thirties for lacking the qualities of an antiwar play—that is, for failing to present an analysis of war and for making the life of the fighting man seem too attractive. And, indeed, it would be too much to maintain that What Price Glory? is a profound study or protest. What the authors accomplished was something else: a picture of war which provides its deepest commentary not in any argument but in its matter-of-fact description of how soldiers live and think "on the spot." It showed, as Joseph Wood Krutch wrote in The Nation, "a way of life"; it indicated that actual warfare develops a civilization or "anti-civilization" of its own, "with a language, a philosophy, and a whole kultur as different from normal life as the kultur and philosophy of the Stone Age were different. . . ." It is as a naturalistic comedy with implicit commentary that What Price Glory? retains vitality.

AUTHOR'S NOTE

What Price Glory? is a play of war as it is, not as it has been presented theatrically for thousands of years. The soldiers talk and act much as soldiers the world over. The speech of men under arms is universally and consistently interlarded with profanity. Oaths mean nothing to a soldier save a means to obtain emphasis. He uses them in place of more polite adjectives.

The authors of What Price Glory? have attempted to reproduce this mannerism along with other general atmosphere they believe to be true. In a theater where war has been lied about, romantically, effectively—and in a city where the war play has usually meant sugary dissimulation—What Price Glory? may seem bold. The audience is asked to bear with certain expletives which, under other circumstances, might be used for melodramatic effect, but herein are employed because the mood and truth of the play demand their employment.

ACT I. SCENE I.

A room in a French farmhouse—now a U. S. Marine company headquarters. A couple of desks covered with maps and papers. Several scattered chairs. Three runners sit talking and smoking, very much at ease. Lipinsky is seated at one end of bench, Kiper at the other; Gowdy is sitting on a stool near Kiper.

GOWDY: Well, where the hell did you come from?
KIPER: Who, me? I come from every place I've GOWDY: Yeah, well, where you been to?

KIPER: Me? I've been to China, Cuba, the Philippines, San Francisco, Buenos Aires, Cape Town, Madagascar . . . wait a minute—Indiana, San Domingo, Tripoli, and Blackwell's Island.

LIPINSKY: Ever going home?

KIPER: Who, me? I can't go anywhere without going home.

GOWDY: By the time this war's over you ought to be pretty near ready to marry and settle down.

KIPER: There ain't going to be any after-this-war. Anyway, I got married after the last two wars and when I get through paying my debt to Lafayette, I'm through settling down. I never have settled down in so many hick towns in my life.

LIPINSKY: What became of them two broads?

KIPER: My wives? LIPINSKY: Yeah.

KIPER: The first one never knew my last name, and when I left town she was out of luck.

GOWDY: And the next one?

KIPER: Ain't I signing the payroll for her every month? A twenty-dollar allotment, and she gives it to a fireman in Buffalo. Here I am saving democracy, and he's turning in a twenty-bell alarm the first of every month.

GOWDY: That's a waste of cash, the way I look at it. It stands to reason when a girl gets rid of one bozo she's looking for another. Now why does the late unlamented finance that little game? There's no justice in that.

KIPER: Who said it was justice? It ain't justice; it's alimony.

GOWDY: Well, alimony's all right if you're well fixed; hell, a girl ought to have some fun! I don't want a girl to quit living just because she ain't living with me, but the guy that's getting his ought to pay for it. What do you want to pay alimony for?

KIPER: What did you want to come to France for? It's the same reason why I pay alimony. So's to see the rest of the girls. Join the Marines and see the girls—from a porthole.

GOWDY: God! I came to France because I had a brain-storm one day and signed on the dotted line.

LIPINSKY: There ain't but one man in the world that came to France to see the mam'selles, and that's the skipper. When there's women around the skipper's got trick eyes like a horsefly.

KIPER: The old man? Say, he can't look at a mam'selle without blushing. Compared to me he's an amateur. He don't know the difference between a

Hong-Kong honky-tonk and a Santo Domingo

LIPINSKY: No. oh. no! I suppose women is an open book to you. You're damn well right—a code book.

KIPER: Yeah, you're damn well right. When I was in Turkey with that landing party the Sultan had to hunt through his harem with a flashlight to find a decent-looking girl, and when I left China the Yangtse was full of the bodies of virgins that drowned their beautiful selves because I was shipping over. And when I was in Spain the king of Spain put an ad in the paper offering a reward for the return of the queen.

GOWDY: What did you do?

KIPER: Took her back for the reward.

LIPINSKY: Huh! I notice you've got Cognac Pete's daughter, too.

KIPER: If I had the skipper's uniform and his Sam Browne belt, I could take that little wench away from him before you could say squads right! You ain't never seen it done. The skip's full of wind.

GOWDY: Anyway, Flagg's got Pete's kid sewed up -and she's as pretty a little frog as ever made a dish of frog's legs.

KIPER: Pete's kid! The poor little tart! What could she do? Ain't the skipper billeted there? God! I guess even Lippy could make a kid if she slept on the other side of a paper wall.

LIPINSKY: God! I don't know. Ain't it the truth some guys just naturally walk away with women? Damned if I could ever do it!

KIPER: Take one good long look at yourself and you'll see why. There ain't many as unfortunate as you are. I guess there ain't anybody handicapped with features like them there.

LIPINSKY: Sometimes I think it's features, and sometimes I think it's luck. Once I spent three hundred dollars on a dame at Asbury Park in two days, and she keeping her damn chum with her all the time. Finally I got the extra one so drunk she couldn't tell her own name, and I ditched her. Then this broad I was trying to make insisted on riding on the merry-go-round. . . . God! the merry-goround. Nothing else would satisfy her. She'd rung ducks till it rained ducks. She'd shot up more powder in shooting galleries than's been shot in this war, and she wanted to ride on the merry-go-round! So we got on the merry-go-round, and I threw her into a chariot and I piled on a horse. She hollers, "Whoopee, whoopee, let's do it again!" Jeez, I had spent three hundred bucks and I said, "Now, honey, let's not ride any more. Come on, let's do what you promised." She said she would after one more turn on the merry-go-round. So I, like a bloody fool, tries to save twenty cents by catching a brass ring. Son-of-a-bitch! I fall off and break my leg!

KIPER: My God!

LIPINSKY: Yes, sir. I broke my leg.

GOWDY: You certainly have had your share of tough luck,

LIPINSKY: So when the captain walks off with the top soldier's girl I say to myself, maybe there's luck in it. Maybe the breaks favored him. They never did favor me.

gowdy: Any skipper can walk off with any ton soldier's girl in my opinion. Say, maybe that's the lowdown on why the sergeant left.

KIPER: Naw-he was too damn good. Regimental took him. We'll probably get a lousy replacement. Probably get a corporal with ten years' experience chasing prisoners at Portsmouth. Soon's the new sergeant gets here the skip's going on ten days' leave.

LIPINSKY: Yeah? Where?

KIPER: Paris.

LIPINSKY: You going with him?

KIPER: Yep.

LIPINSKY: Some guys have all the luck.

[The door opens. Sergeant Quirt, the very picture of an old-timer, enters and looks quickly around. All rise]

QUIRT: L Company?

KIPER: Company Headquarters.

QUIRT: Where's the company commander? KIPER: Just stepped down the street. Will be back

QUIRT: He's going on leave?

KIPER: Right.

QUIRT: What's his name? KIPER: Captain Flagg. QUIRT: Whew!

KIPER: You know him?

QUIRT: Do you? KIPER: Yes, sir!

QUIRT: Company Headquarters. Looks like a God-damn reception room to me.

KIPER: We aim to please.

QUIRT: Yeah, to please yourself. Well, listen, I'm the new top soldier here. Who's the company clerk? LIPINSKY: I am, sir.

QUIRT: Clear this jam out of here and let's have a look at what you're doing.

LIPINSKY: Will you get the hell out? And don't come back till you're sent for.

[Kiper and Gowdy go out]

QUIRT: I've been ten kilometers west of you. Took the wrong turn.

LIPINSKY: Here's the map. That's the only road there is, and we can't use it. The damn thing is one long shell-hole from last May.

OUIRT: Jeez!

LIPINSKY: That's what they all say.

QUIRT: .Don't you ever clean these galleys?

LIPINSKY: We don't do anything else.

QUIRT: You haven't got a police sergeant, I suppose?

LIPINSKY: We've got an acting corporal. Old Hennessey was bumped off last time up.

QUIRT: Spud Hennessey? LIPINSKY: That's the soldier. QUIRT: Tough for Spud to go. A grand soldier. Too damn finicky, though.

LIPINSKY: We've gone to hell for chow since he left.

QUIRT: That's queer. I never knew Flagg to let his men go to hell.

LIPINSKY: Not his fault. These cooks are no good. Hennessey was acting mess sergeant, too.

QUIRT: That's like old times.

LIPINSKY: Yeah?

QUIRT: Say, if the skipper's going ashore they'd better get him out of here before he gets too drunk to navigate. I've seen him shove off with a liberty party and spend a forty-eight-hour leave sleeping it off on the beach.

LIPINSKY: It's the same skip, all right. You know him.

QUIRT: I'll say I do . . . I think I'll look him up. Where's he likely to be?

LIPINSKY: Damned if I know. He might be at Pete's place. Anybody can tell you where that is—just this side of the river.

OUIRT: All right. I'll find it.

[Goes out briskly. After he has gone Lipinsky goes to the door and whistles. Kiper and Gowdy come in]

LIPINSKY: Did you take a slant at the amphibian?

GOWDY: Yeah. KIPER: What of it?

LIPINSKY: He's our new papa.

KIPER: So he says.

LIPINSKY: He's soldiered with the skipper before. Says he never saw the chief sober.

KIPER: Is he hard-boiled?

LIPINSKY: There's only one place in the world they boil them as hard as that, and that's the Tropic of Cancer.

KIPER: What does he know?

LIPINSKY: This God-damn army's going to run right from now on or get off on its ear.

gowdy: He must have used some language on you?

LIPINSKY: Not a word, and I'm not going to give him a chance, either.

KIPER: Scared, huh?

LIPINSKY: You meet a top with two glass eyes, a slit across his face for a mouth and a piece out of his ear, and you might just as well heave out and lash up. That bird could curse the hide off a whole Senegalese regiment.

[Captain Flagg enters and comes to chair above table. He is a fine, magnificently endowed man] FLAGG: 'Tenshun! [Reading report which he picks up from table] Where's that first sergeant?

KIPER: Went out looking for you, sir.

FLAGG: Scatter and find him, a couple of you. [Lipinsky, Gowdy, and Kiper start out] Stay here, Kiper. [Kiper comes back] Damn him, why couldn't he sit still? [Lipinsky and Gowdy go out] What's he like?

KIPER: Tough.

FLAGG: Yeah? I hope he damn well hangs the whole damn company up by the thumbs. About time we had a little discipline around here.

KIPER: Yes, sir.

FLAGG: "Yes, sir!" "Yes, sir!" Shut your trap, will you?

KIPER: Oh, yes, sir.

FLAGG: Go to hell! Everything packed?

KIPER: Absolutely.

FLAGG: Bike working? Side-care trimmed?

KIPER: Tuned it up this morning.

FLAGG: Well, we're going ashore as soon as I see the new top soldier, you understand? And we don't stop for anything smaller than shell-holes!

KIPER: Ay, ay, sir!

FLAGG: Go sit down! Go read a book! You make me nervous. [Kiper sits. Charmaine slips in. She is a drab. Flagg, who is busy at the desk, does not see her at first. He looks up impatiently] Well, hello! Hello! What are you doing here? You better run along back to your papa. Listen, mon amie, you better beat it back to le père, understand?

CHARMAINE: Why?
[She comes nearer]
FLAGG: Well, I'm busy.

CHARMAINE: You are going away.

FLAGG: So that's it. Kiper, did you tell the kid I was going away?

KIPER: No, sir, she saw me with your musette pag.

CHARMAINE: The sergeant went away. He is not coming back. Now you go away. You are not coming back.

FLAGG: As far as the sergeant's concerned, you're quite right, dearie; but as far as I'm concerned, you're dead wrong. The sergeant isn't coming back. We have a new sergeant, see? But I am coming back.

CHARMAINE: Oui? FLAGG: Oui, oui!

CHARMAINE: No. You are such a lovely liar. You don't want to make me cry. So you lie a little—n'est-ce pas?

FLAGG: [Takes her by shoulders] I'm not lying, Charmaine. I don't know how I can prove it to you, but I'm telling the solemn truth. [A knock on the door] See who that is, and keep him out, whoever it is.

KIPER: [Opens the door, goes out, and returns] It's Lewisohn, third platoon replacement. He wants permission to speak with you, sir.

FLAGG: What about?

KIPER: Lost something, sir.

FLAGG: Let him in. [Lewisohn enters. He is a pale little boy] Let's have it quick, soldier.

LEWISOHN: [Saluting] Beg pardon, sir.

[Very much scared]

FLAGG: What do you want?

LEWISOHN: The truth is, sir, I've lost my identification tag.

FLAGG: What? What? Lost what? LEWISOHN: My identification tag.

FLAGG: Well, I thought I'd been around a good deal, and I've had 'em ask me to show 'em where they live and button up their pants for them and put on their little night-drawers, but I'm a son-of-agun if this isn't the first time anybody has ever asked me to help him find his identification tag!

LEWISOHN: Sorry, sir. I—I thought it was—I....

FLAGG: What did you think?

LEWISOHN: I thought it was important, sir.

FLAGG: And what, may I ask, made you think it was important?

LEWISOHN: In case I was—ah—hit, sir. They wouldn't know who I was. I thought maybe it would matter.

FLAGG: Matter? To whom?

LEWISOHN: Well—to keep the records—or to my folks

FLAGG: Listen, boy, why did you ever leave your home and come over here?

LEWISOHN: Why, to fight, sir.

FLAGG: Yeah. Well, you'll get a chance, don't you worry, and for God's sake learn to act like a man. Never mind your identification tag. If you want to know what your name is look in your hat.

LEWISOHN: Yes, sir.

FLAGG: By the way, what is your name?

LEWISOHN: Louis Lewisohn.

FLAGG: [To Kiper] Make a note of that, Kiper. [Kiper makes a note in the book he carries in his pocket] Now, anything else? Hope you got a good room with a view and running water and everything.

LEWISOHN: No, sir.

[Swallowing a lump in his throat]

FLAGG: No? I'm surprised. Well, go on outside and swear at me a while. It'll do you good, and that's what I'm here for. I'm here to keep you in hot water till you're hard-boiled. See? You can go.

LEWISOHN: Yes, sir.

[He salutes and goes]

FLAGG: Make a note of that, Kiper, and get him a new tag if they have to build a new factory in Hoboken to turn it out. The God-forsaken fool's dying of grief away from mother. Got it?

KIPER: Yes, Captain Flagg.

FLAGG: Then step outside and guard the door a minute. [Kiper salutes and goes out, closing the door carefully. Flagg then turns to Charmaine] Now, you little she-woman, what do you want?

CHARMAINE: You are going away.

FLAGG: Damn it, I'm not going away. I'm going to Paris—coming back in eight days. Eight days in Paris, see, then I come back.

CHARMAINE: The sergeant did not come back.

FLAGG: My God, child, get this! The sergeant is not coming back. I am coming back. We have a new sergeant, see?

CHARMAINE: Oui?

FLAGG: Oui, oui.

CHARMAINE: No. I think the captain does not love me. not any more?

FLAGG: Girlie, I love you fit to kill. I love you no end, same as always. Come here. [She puts her arms around his neck. Flagg takes her in his arms] You're as sweet as Burgundy, and you've got a kick like triple sec. Sure I love you. Everybody loves you. I love you, dearie girl, but I don't trust you.

CHARMAINE: You take me to Paris? Yes? Take me to Paris?

FLAGG: No. I guess not.

CHARMAINE: But I'm so unhappy when you go away.

FLAGG: Yes, you are! I wish you were. Why, you little geisha [Chucking her under the chin], if I didn't wear captain's stripes you wouldn't know me from the K.P.'s.

CHARMAINE: No, dear Captain Flagg. [Her arms on his shoulders. She runs a hand through his hair] It is true, I shall be so lonesome. I shall be all alone at the inn, crying every day to break your heart.

FLAGG: You'll be dancing all night and flirting all day with the Y.M.C.A. boys, you mean. Ain't it so?

CHARMAINE: Oui. But you could take me. I can't be good—unless you take me. I want to be good for you. We could have so good time—in Paris.

FLAGG: No, I can't take you. But listen. [Takes hold of her shoulders] While I'm gone you wait for me. Remember, you're my girl, see? Just my girl, and you wait for me, see?

CHARMAINE: Oui, I will.

FLAGG: And listen to this. [Putting her away] If I find out you've been running with someone else, I'll break you in two, see? [He makes the motion of breaking something] Now, will you be good while I'm gone?

CHARMAINE: [Coming into his arms] Oui, monsieur.

FLAGG: That's better. You know what I mean? CHARMAINE: Oui.

FLAGG: That's right, little kitten, purr. . . . And remember, I don't trust you any further than I can see you. Now run along. [Flagg turns to table, but Charmaine follows him]

CHARMAINE: But you will take me to Paris?

FLAGG: [Seating himself on edge of table, he beckons her with his finger and takes her on his knee, between his legs] You ever been to Paris?

CHARMAINE: Non . . .

FLAGG: Well, there's a river in Paris.

CHARMAINE: La Seine.

FLAGG: Yeah, the Seine. That's where they drown little girls like you. Every time the police catch a little girl in Paris, they drown her in the Seine. You can't go there. They'd drown you.

CHARMAINE: It is not true.

FLAGG: It is true. I'll tell you another thing. There's nothing to eat in Paris, no food but horses; no wine, only water. No young girls, only old women. Some of the girls they drown in the Seine; some they make into sausages for the generals. Paris is full of generals that won't eat anything but young girls. You can't go to Paris.

CHARMAINE: You are full of lovely lies. Oh, it is not true.

FLAGG: Uh, you don't know Paris.

CHARMAINE: Oh, but I know these captains and sergeants! They do not ever put anything, what you say, past me. But, oh, I love you for a lovely liar! [Embraces him] And I will be good; I will, vraiment!

FLAGG: That's a good girl. Now you go back to Papa Pete's. Stay home nights. Wait for Captain Flagg. Kiss me good-bye. [She kisses him] Now run along. [She goes] Kiper!

KIPER: [Coming in] Yes, sir.

FLAGG: Have you found that sergeant yet? KIPER: He's coming with Lipinsky, sir. FLAGG: Tell him to damn well get a wiggle on.

KIPER: [To Quirt, outside] He's waiting for you, sir.

[Lipinsky enters with Quirt]
QUIRT: [Saluting] Captain Flagg?

FLAGG: [Returns salute and remains seated, not even glancing at Quirt] Hello, Sergeant. Where've you been all day?

QUIRT: Ten kilometers west by mistake. FLAGG: Do you know our lay-out?

QUIRT: I've got a general idea.

FLAGG: What kind of a hole were you in over there?

QUIRT: Much the same as yours, only we had a road.

FLAGG: Do you think you can handle this company? It's a rough crowd of old men and little baa-lamb recruits.

[He still does not look up]

QUIRT: It's an army, ain't it? Sure.

FLAGG: I damn well hope you can. We're in a devilish sector here, and it's going to be worse when we move up again. We just hold half a town; the Heinies hold the other half. It rains grenades most of the time. About half our men are green replacements. They damned near ruined us in that last tour of duty. You'll have to whip some of 'em into shape before we go up. Close order drill is best.

QUIRT: Half of 'em raw?

FLAGG: Over half.

QUIRT: Well, I've seen worse.

FLAGG: Now, I'm going on leave, you see. Eight days. While I'm gone you feed 'em up and give 'em hell. Teach 'em where they are. Make 'em so bad they'll eat steel rather than get another dressing from you. Make 'em hard, but don't break 'em. Give 'em eats and about eight hours of drill and guns a day. They're mostly Bible Class boys, and God knows most of 'em haven't got long to live.

QUIRT: [Takes step toward table] Cut the comedy, Captain. You must know me.

FLAGG: [Rising, looks at Quirt for the first time]

Yeah? I'm a cuckoo if it ain't the old Hoppergrass! QUIRT: Thought you didn't know me. Well, I'm glad to meet you again, Captain Flagg.

FLAGG: Kiper—— KIPER: Yes, sir.

FLAGG: Step out and tell all platoon commanders to report here at once.

KIPER: Ay, ay, sir.

[Exits]

FLAGG: Well, Quirt, I'm glad to see you, because if there was ever a good soldier needed I need one here, and you're as good as there is; but I'm damned if I take any particular joy in meeting you again. You've been poison to me everywhere I've served with you.

QUIRT: [At right of table] Same to you, I'm sure, and many of 'em. Personally I'd as soon meet a skunk in a dugout, and officially I don't think much of your crew. I broke you the first time in China, and you broke me in Cuba. You're in a position to break me now, and if you didn't need me worse than the wildcat needed what he didn't have, you'd break me again.

FLAGG: I'd see you in hell before I'd break you, and you know it. I'll give you exactly what you deserve, and as long as you're straight we'll get along, always providing we don't have to shake hands. If that's understood, why, take hold. The company's yours.

QUIRT: Well, before I take hold, let me get one more remark in the record. I wish to God I could jump your damn gang. I've heard of it all along the line. You've got a rabble, and I know it. I saw it coming into Is-sur-Tille once when you didn't see me. A shambling bunch of hams that wouldn't salute anything under a general.

FLAGG: All right, and what's my outfit's rating at regimental?

QUIRT: Oh, I got to hand it to you. You can hypnotize 'em. They'd start out to cut their way to Berlin if you gave the word. But, my God, they ain't much to look at, Captain Flagg.

FLAGG: Well, teach 'em to salute if it'll make you feel any happier, Hoppergrass. And before the platoon commanders get here, there's one thing I'd like to ask you. What did you do with the little girl?

QUIRT: What little girl?

FLAGG: You damn well know what little girl.

QUIRT: It's a small world, Captain Flagg, but the number of soldiers' sluts is numerous.

FLAGG: I was a corporal under you in China. You broke me to get her.

QUIRT: You were a damn fool. You'd have married her if it hadn't been for me, and be running a laundry now with the seat of your pants hanging down between your knees.

FLAGG: What happened to her?

QUIRT: What happened to the battleship Maine?

FLAGG: My God. . . .

QUIRT: I broke you in China. I admit I broke you for that little Chink. And when I served under you in Cuba you got even. That's why I'm still a sergeant. [A knock at the door from Kiper] Let it go at that.

FLAGG: Kiper?

KIPER: [Outside] Ay, ay, sir!

FLAGG: Bring 'em in. [Kiper opens the door 'and follows into the room Lieutenants Aldrich, Moore, and Schmidt, and Gunnery Sergeant Sockel. They salute. They line up] Gentlemen, this is First Sergeant Quirt, who is in charge. This is Lieutenant Aldrich; this is Lieutenant Moore, and this is Lieutenant Schmidt, and you'll remember Sockel from Cuba. He's commanding the fourth platoon.

QUIRT: [Turns to Sockel] Hello, Joe. How's tricks? SOCKEL: Pretty good. How's yourself?

[They smile broadly, two old-timers among green lieutenants]

QUIRT: Ticking like a clock.

FLAGG: Aldrich, you're senior here, aren't you? ALDRICH: Yes, sir. Two days ahead of the others. FLAGG: You'll be in command here. Ask Quirt for any advice you need. I'll be back Wednesday week. . . Now, men, Sergeant Quirt here is one of the best God-damn soldiers that ever destroyed a memorandum receipt. I've soldiered with him around the world, and there isn't a finer, cleaner, smarter Marine afloat than Quirt-when he's sober. As long as he's sober, he'll run this outfit-whether I'm here or absent; but Quirt loves the bottle; and when he's drunk he's the lousiest, filthiest bum that ever wore a uniform. When drunk, he's worse than I am, and you know damn well I don't allow anybody to get as bad as that. If he tanks up I'll break him. I've broken him once, and he knows I'll do it again. The first raw crack he makes will find him drilling in the rear rank of Sockel's platoon, drilling like a tramp with a broom for a rifle. Get that, Aldrich; the first time you find him down in the square with a face in the dirt in front of all these young nipple-nursers, you lock him up and keep him locked up till I return.

ALDRICH: Yes, sir.

FLAGG: Give him his head, and let him have anything he wants, and don't forget he's forgotten more about being a soldier than any of you college boys will ever know. But if you're wise you won't play cards with him, and before you lend him any money you'd better kiss it a last long farewell. That's all. Kiper, have you got the waterproofs in that side-car?

KIPER: Ay, ay, sir.

FLAGG: Give her a spin, and we'll shove off.

[Picks up cap and stick from table and goes out, followed by all save Quirt. Off stage, the motorcycle clatters. The Lieutenants shout farewell. Quirt goes up to right window, looks out, and then sits at table, takes out dice, and practices a few turns. He holds the dice up to his eyes and then spins. Quirt whistles "Pretty Baby"] QUIRT: Seven, baby. [He smiles with satisfaction]

Look at those acrobats act. You got to treat the old man right, now. [There is a light tap on the door to left. Quirt puts dice in pocket and looks at map] Come in.

[Charmaine enters]

CHARMAINE: Le nouveau sergeant. N'est-ce pas?

QUIRT: N'est-ce pas is right.

CHARMAINE: I wanted to see the captain.

QUIRT: Just too late, sorry to say. [Looks at her for first time] You one piecie captain's fella boy? You captain's fella?

CHARMAINE: Le capitaine? Mais non!

QUIRT: I'll bet it's mais mon. Say, ain't you Cognac Pete's daughter?

CHARMAINE: Oui. You stay at Pete's?

QUIRT: Sure. [Pause] Et vous? CHARMAINE: C'est mon père.

QUIRT: Uh-huh. I thought so. [Rises; crosses to her] Well, baby, you better stick to me, and you'll have another papa.

[A terrific commotion begins outside. A vociferous Irish voice is heard shouting over and over again, "I'll get that lousy German son-of-abitch, I'll get the German bastard," while Lipinsky and Gowdy yell, "Cut it out, you loafer. Dry up, dry up or you'll get yours." Lipinsky opens the door. Charmaine steps back. The shouting is audible only when door is open]

LIPINSKY: Sergeant, there's a drunken Mick named Mulcahy raising hell outside. Can't do a thing with him, Got blood in his eyes for a guy from Cincinnati.

QUIRT: [Sternly, out of the corner of his mouth, not looking at him] Tell him to pipe down. [Lipinsky goes out. Door closes; shouting stops. Charmaine goes toward door] Better not go out there now, honey. Some rough language is taking place out there.

[Lipinsky re-enters. Shouting is started again] LIPINSKY: Sergeant, the Mick's sitting on Gowdy, and I can't pull him off.

QUIRT: [Quietly, as before] Tell him to pipe down. [Lipinsky goes out. Shouting stops. Quirt crosses to Charmaine] You going to promenade avec moi tonight? Down by the canal? Under the lime trees?

CHARMAINE: No. [She is trembling]

QUIRT: No? Captain's own private darling, huh? Say, you're a damned pretty frog. For a frog, I don't know as I ever saw a prettier.

[The hullabaloo redoubles outside. Lipinsky comes in again]

LIPINSKY: Shall we lock him up, Sergeant? QUIRT: Drag him in.

[Lipinsky and Gowdy drag in a huge, red-faced Irishman and stand him groggily on his feet below Quirt]

MULCAHY: That damn Nussbaum from Cincinnati is a German spy, and I'll have his guts out of him before I'm through.

OUIRT: [Quietly] Mulcahy, pipe down.

MULCAHY: I tell you that Nussbaum is a German spy! I'll get the lousy German and every German out of Cincinnati. . . .

[The Sergeant plants one squarely on Mulcahy's jaw, He goes down like a log]

QUIRT: [Still out of the corner of his mouth] Drag him out.

[Lipinsky and Gowdy take him by arms, turn him around, and drag him out. Quirt, rubbing his knuckles, crosses back of table to Charmaine, who is smiling at her wonderful hero with the powerful punch]

QUIRT: Why, hello, Pittsburgh, you love me? [They embrace and hold a long kiss]

CURTAIN

SCENE II.

Late afternoon, eight days later. The scene is unchanged. Lipinsky is lying along bench, smoking a cigarette and trying to sleep at the same time. Kiper enters, singing at the top of his voice. Lipinsky's cap is down over his eyes. Police Sergeant Ferguson is at table toward back, working over papers; he is smoking a pipe.

KIPER: "Mademoiselle from Armentiere, parlez-Mademoiselle from Armentiere, parlez vous? Mademoiselle from Armentiere——" Hullo, hullo—Jeezus.

[Puts musette bags in corner] LIPINSKY: Knock off that chat. [On bench; doesn't move]

KIPER: Say, are you running this God-damn army?

LIPINSKY: You're damn well right, I'm running this army.

KIPER: Well, you had better God-damn well snap out of it. You're relieved.

LIPINSKY: [Sitting up] Skipper come back? KIPER: Almost. He's at the Last Chance.

LIPINSKY: Still soaked?

KIPER: He ain't soaked. He's just the drunkest bum you ever saw in your life.

LIPINSKY: Trying to whip the world?

KIPER: Naw, just quiet drunk. Looks out of those eyes of his like two red holes in the snow.

LIPINSKY: How's Paris?

KIPER: Never got that far. Washed ashore at Bar-le-Duc.

LIPINSKY: Yeah? Good time? KIPER: Pretty good the first day. LIPINSKY: What'd you do the rest? KIPER: You see, it was this way. The skip and me was promenading, and he was swinging that damn little Pekin swagger-stick of his when up comes an M.P. "Sorry, sir," says the M.P. "Corps commander's regulations, sir, no swagger-sticks." The skip says, "Well, and who, may I ask, is the corps commander? Tell him he can take his lousy army and sell it for cheese." "Sorry, sir," says the M.P. "Corps commander's regulations, sir, and I'll have to take that stick away from you." "All right," says the skip, whirling the stick around his head, "pitch in, soldier, pitch in!"

LIPINSKY: Did he take it away?

KIPER: Aw, take it away! Listen to the poor nut. I spent the next six days of my leave detained as a material witness for attempted manslaughter.

LIPINSKY: I guess the skip didn't draw much?

KIPER: Draw hell! Didn't I swear this yellowbellied M.P. came up and knocked him into the road?

LIPINSKY: Yeah?

KIPER: And the court looks at this M.P. and says, "Right face! Take him away and give him ten days, bread and water."

LIPINSKY: Serve him right, the Boy Scout! They ought to take away those guys' whistles before they blow themselves to death. And speaking of whistles, this new top of ours don't do nothing else at all besides blow a whistle. It's been one bloody formation after another ever since you left.

KIPER: Is that the kind of hombre he is?

LIPINSKY: He's a sea-going son-of-a-bitch. He ain't sit down since he was here. He's got the first platoon down in the village now taking up the dirt from the courtyard with teaspoons. You can't get in the chow line until you catch twenty horseflies. He seen Cooper pulling a fag at reveille this morning. What's Cooper doing now? Boy, following the ponies, following the ponies. He's out collecting apples.

KIPER: Well, the skip will make him cut that stuff. Me and the skip ain't going to see the little boys bullied.

LIPINSKY: You and the skip, yeah. But say, the skip and this top soldier are going to tangle pantlegs over another little matter before they have been together one day.

KIPER: What t'hell!

LIPINSKY: This horny pelican is going aboard the skip's old hooker every night.

KIPER: Down at Cognac Pete's house?

LIPINSKY: Parking his dogs in Pete's kitchen every night with that little black-eyed frog sitting in his lap lighting his pipe.

KIPER: If the skip finds that out there'll be a noise like you'd throw a tomcat in a dog-pound.

[Enter Sergeant Quirt]

QUIRT: [To Kiper] Where's Captain Flagg?

KIPER: Last Chance.

QUIRT: What the hell do you mean, coming in here without him? What do you think you're paid for?

KIPER: I tried to argue with him, Sergeant, and he picked me up and threw me cut the window. Lucky for me it was open.

QUIRT: Go get him. Don't argue. Get him. Take Lippy along.

[Lipinsky and Kiper start, hesitate, and talk. Quirt starts toward chair above table. Lieutenant Aldrich enters]

ALDRICH: Heard the skipper was aboard.

QUIRT: [Turning to Aldrich] Grounded on the last

ALDRICH: Yeah?

QUIRT: [To Kiper and Lipinsky, who hurry off] Cast off, will you? Travel! Hit the deck! [To Aldrich] Sending out a salvage party. He's full to the scuppers.

ALDRICH: All I hope is he comes in mild and goes to sleep. He's got too damn much talent for raising hell to suit me.

QUIRT: You ought to see him in China. Straight as a mast, muscled like a gorilla, Christian as hell. Good deal of liquor has flowed under his belt since then

ALDRICH: Expect any trouble? QUIRT: What do you mean?

ALDRICH: This here now little wild woman.

QUIRT: I don't know what's your game.

ALDRICH: Oh, all right! Just the same, you'd be a damn sight wiser to lay off, in my opinion.

QUIRT: Lay off what? ALDRICH: Charmaine.

QUIRT: [Turning to Aldrich] Are you thinking of making this a three-handed game?

ALDRICH: I am not.

QUIRT: Because if you are, all I got to say is, help yourself to whatever you can get. It's love in a manner of speaking, and it's certainly war. Everything dirty goes.

ALDRICH: Suit yourself. You've known him longer than I have.

QUIRT: He's got a grudge against me, I don't mind telling you. And I ain't wasting any ardent affection on him. If it hadn't been for him, I'd had a company of my own. I didn't know she was his meat when I first saw her. But when I found out, d'you think I'd apologize and back out the door out of deference to him? I says, Kippy-dope, you're mine!

ALDRICH: Yeah—but do you know what I heard at mess to-day?

QUIRT: Nope.

ALDRICH: Well, now listen. I didn't intend to mix into this unless it was necessary, but Schmidt got it straight yesterday that old Cognac Pete was going to prosecute some soldier or other for corrupting Charmaine's morals.

QUIRT: Charmaine's what? Jeez, that's good! ALDRICH: Maybe so. Just the same, he's got a case. QUIRT: He has not. ALDRICH: No? Suppose he gets you before a court martial? It's a hanging matter if he wants to push it. You know the regulations.

OUIRT: You mean he's after me?

ALDRICH: I don't know who he's after. You—or Flagg. Has Cognac anything on you?

QUIRT: Well, they might hang me once as a sort of lesson to me.

[Motorcycle clatters outside]

ALDRICH: Well, there you are. Suppose he takes it to headquarters. Where's Quirt then? Sitting pretty?

QUIRT: Well, I just resign all rights and interests in the mam'selle and avoid possible complications. ALDRICH: Fine. There's Kiper already. If Flagg's with him, for God's sake use c little diplomacy.

[Outside, Flagg in drunken voice says, "Get out of my way, Kiper." Noise of Kiper being pushed]

QUIRT: Diplomacy, with that?

[Flagg enters, coat in hand and hair mussed. He still carries stick. Lipinsky and Kiper follow. All stand at attention until the Captain is seated]

ALDRICH: [Saluting] How are you, Captain Flagg? FLAGG: I'm a wreck, that's what I am! I'm an epoch-making disaster! You see before you, Mr. Aldrich, one of the seven great calamities of the world!

QUIRT: Hope you had a pleasant leave, sir.

FLAGG: Well, I didn't. Held for carrying a stick. Picked up the second day by one of Pershing's Sunday-school teachers. By God, he must think he's running a day nursery! . . . What's happened?

QUIRT: Not a thing. FLAGG: Boys in shape?

QUIRT: They'll do. Three more days, and I'd risk them on the line.

FLAGG: Try and get three days. If we aren't digging in somewhere before then, I'll pay the Russian national debt out of my salary. How much do you think I spent in Bar-le-Duc?

QUIRT: How much did you have?

FLAGG: Eight hundred francs, and I got a chance to get rid of thirty. Here's the whole roll. Does anybody want it? Just my luck to have to move in again with seven hundred and seventy francs on me and get bumped off. [A knock at the door by Brigade Runner] Come in.

[A Brigade Runner enters] THE RUNNER: Captain Flagg?

FLAGG: Right here.

THE RUNNER: From Captain Simpson, sir. He wanted you to know the "G One" crowd is on the way over.

FLAGG: Tell him I'm much obliged. Anything else?

THE RUNNER: That's all. How do I get to the Twelfth?

FLAGG: Show him, Kiper. [Kiper and the Runner salute and go out. Flagg starts to button his coat] Damn headquarters! It's some more of that worldsafe-for-democracy slush! Every time they come around here I've got to ask myself is this an army or is it a stinking theosophical society for ethical culture and the Bible-backing uplift! I don't want that band of Gideons from headquarters. Now you watch that door. Watch it! In ten minutes we're going to have another of these round-headed gentlemen of the old school here giving us a prepared lecture on what we're fighting the war for and how we're to do it-one of these bill-poster chocolate soldiers with decorations running clear around to his backbone and a thrilling speech on army morale and the last drop of fighting blood that puts your drive over to glorious victory! . . . The side-whiskered butter-eaters! I'd like to rub their noses in a few of the latrines I've slept in, keeping up army morale and losing men because some screaming fool back in the New Jersey sector thinks he's playing with paper dolls. [A knock] Well, come in, come in. [Lieutenant Moore enters | Hello.

MOORE: How are you, Captain Flagg? Hope you liked Bar-le-Duc?

FLAGG: Ever been there?

MOORE: Once.

FLAGG: Ever put in much time in the redecorated chicken stable where they detain the A.W.O.L.'s?

MOORE: Afraid I never saw it, sir.

FLAGG: Well, you haven't missed a great deal. They whitewashed the damn shanty right over the hen manure. Phew! I can smell it yet. If I stayed there another day I'd have laid an egg.

MOORE: Tough luck! But what I really wanted to say, sir, was there's an old fellow outside here who wants to see you about his daughter. He seems to think somebody's taken advantage of her.

FLAGG: Somebody in this outfit?

MOORE: Yes, sir.

FLAGG: Took advantage of the girl, huh?

MOORE: That's what he says.

FLAGG: He means she took advantage of her opportunities and now he's taking advantage of his. What's the old boy's name?

MOORE: Can't quite make it out, but it seems to be Pete something or other. Are there any Petes in France? Sounded like Cognac Pete.

FLAGG: Yeah?

MOORE: Sounded like it.

FLAGG: [Rising, perturbed] Well, wait a minute.

Cognac Pete's, huh? Is the girl with him?

MOORE: No. FLAGG: Hell!

QUIRT: Think fast, Captain. Think fast.

FLAGG: Quirt, do you know anything about this?

OUIRT: [Starting to leave] Not a thing.

FLAGG: You leaving us?

QUIRT: [Unembarrassed] A few orders to make out, sir. [He grins] Can't very well work here, you see.

FLAGG: I'm damned if I see. Sit down and spill your ink. And if you've put a game on me, you crawling crab. . . .

QUIRT: Me? What have I got to do with it? Think fast, Captain, think fast.

FLAGG: Damn it, send him in, and we'll see. [Moore goes out] Hell!

QUIRT: [Laughing] Think fast, Captain. Don't forget to think fast.

FLAGG: You sit where you are, you hyena; and laugh, damn you, laugh. [Enter Cognac Pete, an ancient nut-brown Frenchman, very polite and humble, followed by Moore and Kiper. Moore and Pete stand by the table. Kiper sits on bench] Pete, what's this I hear about a complaint? What's the matter, huh? One of my men, huh?

PETE: Oui, mon capitaine.

FLAGG: I'm damned if I can leave this damn army half a day without hell breaking loose somewhere. Come on, let's have it; spit it out.

MOORE: Allay, Pete.

PETE: [Speaking in an unintelligible rush of French] Ah, monsieur le capitaine, je suis un vieillard; mais j'ai vécu heureusement, et mes enfants ont été toujours honnêtes, mais hélas, mon capitaine, quelque chose de terrible vient de passer, une calamité monstrueuse. . . .

FLAGG: [To Moore] What's on the menu? Do you get anything out of that?

MOORE: He says something has happened.

FLAGG: [Distressed] Does it take all that vocabulary to say something has happened in French? Well, keep going, keep going.

MOORE: Allay, Pete.

PETE: Mais, mon capitaine, voilà que les Américains arrivent. Ils sont grands et forts, et ils demandent toujours ce qu'ils veulent. Ils ne s'accoutument pas à nos mæurs ni à nos habitudes, mais—nom de Dieu!—pourquoi choisissent-ils la seule fleur de ma vie, quand ils peuvent trouver n'importe où qu'ils vont des poules qui les désirent? Ma seule fleur, ma fleur Charmaine, ma fleur délicate!

FLAGG: What language is he talking now?

MOORE: He says the soldiers take what they want, and they have trampled the one flower of his life.

FLAGG: Is that all he said?

MOORE: The rest is poetry.

FLAGG: [Impatiently] Well, tell him to omit flowers, see, omit flowers.

MOORE: [To Pete] Brièvement.

PETE: Ma fille. Ma fille bien-aimée. Elle est défleurée. Elle est dans la boue, elle est déshonorée.

FLAGG: [To Moore] More flowers?

MOORE: No, sir. He says his daughter's been—ah—ruined [Pause] . . . so to speak.

FLAGG: Ruined, huh? Rape or seduction?

MOORE: [To Pete] S'est-elle soumise, ou l'a-t-on forcée?

PETE: Les Américains sont si forts. Ils se forcent sur elle, ils ferment sa bouche de façon qu'elle ne peut donner l'alarme. Que peut faire la petite fille? L'Américaine est forte, elle peut se défendre, mais la Française, elle est gentille et modeste et craintive et ne sait se défendre.

FLAGG: [To Moore] Now what's all that?

MOORE: Rape, sir.

FLAGG: Does he allude to any specific girl, or is he speaking of French wenches in general?

MOORE: [To Pete] Comment s'appelle ta fille?

PETE: Charmaine.
MOORE: Charmaine, sir.

FLAGG: [Very seriously] Look here, Moore. You know as well as I do, this same little baggage has been pretty free with me. What's the old boy's game? And for God's sake, what do you think you're up to, bringing him in here?

MOORE: You mean you're . . . God, I didn't know that!

FLAGG: You didn't! You must go around here wearing blinders. You see the fix you've got me in? OUIRT: Think fast, Captain, think fast.

MOORE: To tell the truth, I got the impression it was somebody else. Honest to God, I thought he said it was a soldier. . . . [Flagg hesitates and then gives Moore a quick look. Moore is embarrassed] I wasn't sure, but I got that impression.

FLAGG: Did he name anybody?

MOORE: No.

FLAGG: [Turning away] Well, damn her little soul. No, I know damn well it wasn't anybody else. [Turns to Moore] Ask him how much he wants.

MOORE: How much what?

FLAGG: Money, you highbrow, money! What do you think he wants?

MOORE: I don't know, but if I thought he wanted money I certainly would not have listened to him.

FLAGG: You're just a bleating babe in the woods, you are. That's what they all want.

MOORE: He told me he wanted the man to marry the girl.

FLAGG: Marry her!

PETE: Elle était une petite enfant innocente, une fleur à demi ouverte.

FLAGG: What's that? Flowers again?

MOORE: He says she was an innocent child.

FLAGG: Listen. You tell him I'm sure she's still an innocent girl. Tell him Charmaine is one of the most virtuous and respectable ladies I've ever had the pleasure of meeting.

MOORE: [To Pete] Monsieur le capitaine dit que c'est impossible et que vous vous trompez, monsieur, parce que Charmaine est tout à fait honnête et vertueuse.

PETE: [Shaking his head] Non! non! non!—je ne me trompe pas—malheureusement c'est bien la vérité.

MOORE: He's sure of it.

FLAGG: Ask him if he wants to bring charges.

MOORE: Désirez-vous le faire passer au conseil de guerre?

PETE: Conseil de guerre? Ça se peut.

MOORE: He says perhaps.

FLAGG: What does he mean, "perhaps"? Ask him how much he wants.

MOORE: Il demande ce que vous voulez.

PETE: Mais la petite qui est défleurée—il faut qu'on la fasse honnête, et moi—est-ce donc que l'honneur de ma famille ne vaut rien? Il faut qu'ils se marient, et quant à moi—il faut me payer si je ne le fais pas passer devant le conseil de guerre. Il me faut cinq cent francs.

FLAGG: Flowers?

MOORE: No, he wants the fellow to marry the girl—and he wants five hundred francs.

FLAGG: I see. That's better. Tell him he can have three hundred. Tell him he can pick any son-in-law he wants out of the whole damn army.

MOORE: [To Pete] Elle peut choisir n'importe qui qu'il soit de toute la compagnie—et vous—vous aurez trois cent francs.

PETE: [Suddenly wildly angry] Ça ne va pas! Vous vous moquez de moi, vous officiers américains. Je connais le truc—moi—de vous voir m'insulter quand il s'agit de la rapace. Alors, messieurs, j'irai au G.H.Q. et vous verrez. C'est la mort, et gare à votre peau! Me voilà qui vient vous voir ici, malheureux mais amical, et je ne reçois que des insultes. Cinq cent francs! Rien de moins, et il la marie.

[He starts for door]

FLAGG: Wait a minute. [Aldrich bars the door] What's wrong?

MOORE: He's insulted. Going to headquarters. Five hundred, he wants; and it's a certain man, he says.

FLAGG: What man? MOORE: Quel homme?

PETE: [Turning, crosses in front of table; to Quirt, dramatically] Le voilà! Alors je m'en vais. Vous vous moquez de moi! Laissez-moi partir.

[Quirt rises, knocking over chair]

FLAGG: [Taking a step toward Quirt] Quirt, what's the meaning of this?

QUIRT: Sorry, sir, I don't quite catch the drift myself.

FLAGG: Have you been around with Charmaine? QUIRT: Charmaine? I don't think so, Captain. But I've got a poor memory for names.

FLAGG: You're a liar. You knew Charmaine was mine, and you couldn't keep your hands off her.

QUIRT: Yeah? It's getting to be a habit of mine, huh? Whaddye going to do about it, Captain Flagg?

FLAGG: Oh? What [Walks to table] am I going to do about it?—I'm going to marry you to Charmaine and let you make an honest woman out of her! Quirt, you've taken the detail right off my shoulders, and it's your turn to think fast! [Turns to Moore] Mr. Moore, now tell the old man that the sergeant was making honest proposals and desperate love! Ask what church he belongs to, or whether he wants 'em married by the cashier of the bank.

[Turns to Quirt. Moore turns to Pete; they start toward the door] Sergeant, you arrived in the nick of time with replacements! You saved the day! The Marines have landed and have the situation well in hand! We're going to decorate you! We're going to let you hold the bag!

QUIRT: All very interesting, Captain. But how are you going to do it? I may have landed, but I don't remember seeing any article in what I signed saying you could pick my woman for me. Seems to me you'd learned that I pick my women for myself.

FLAGG: Quirt, you've signed on for a cruise with this woman, and you can't jump ship. I can tell Aldrich to stand out of the way and let this old man go to headquarters with his story about you... and what chance has a lousy Marine sergeant got before an army court-martial when ten majors start the iron ball rolling? Ten army majors back in Paris, who ain't going to let anybody do any seducing but themselves. Don't be a hayshaker, Quirt. You can't play guardhouse lawyer in this country. You're in the army now, with a lot of western shysters sitting in the judge advocate general's room.

QUIRT: And who's going to be witness against me? You couldn't get that little frog to swear anything. I'm too damned handsome a soldier. I'm strong with this little French broad. Told me last night, just before you come back, she never loved a soldier who loved like me. Said she wished the whole damned outfit would move away and leave us in peace. Why, she's jealous every time I have to go to formation.

FLAGG: Sergeant, in about five minutes you're going to be married; in about eight you're going to please this old man by leaving an allotment here for about two-thirds of your pay in regular army style. The more you talk, the more you hang yourself up by the thumbs.

QUIRT: This ain't talk. What do you say I go get this little baby and ask her if she'll say anything about me that ain't praise and admiration? What do you say I go get her? What do I care a whoop in hell what this old bozo says about me? I ain't seduced him! He's after money. Well, I ain't got money. I don't have to carry money around in my love affairs. What do you say I go get her?

FLAGG: Of course, you'll go get her. And propose marriage to her on the way, because you'll meet the wedding detail when you get here. Gowdy, go to the Y tent and get the chaplain. [Gowdy goes out] Aldrich, accompany Sergeant Quirt to the tavern and tell Charmaine that I'm giving away in marriage the handsomest sergeant in the corps. Tell her she's a woman in a thousand, because Quirt has already run away from a thousand; and if it weren't for my seeing justice done him, he'd run away from that many more. All right, Quirt, we'll be waiting for you. [Quirt and Aldrich go out. Ferguson fixes chair, returns to seat, and turns to Moore] Mr. Moore, tell papa the wedding bells are going to ring, and there's money in it for him, money in it!

[Moore seats Pete on stool at window; then whispers. A knock at the door. Lipinsky opens it]

LIPINSKY: Brigade runner, Captain Flagg.

FLAGG: Send him in.
[The Runner enters]

RUNNER: Company commander? FLAGG: What is it—shoving off? RUNNER: Moving in an hour, sir.

FLAGG: In an hour?
RUNNER: Please initial.
[Offers pencil and paper]

FLAGG: [Signing] You hear that, Moore?

MOORE: Yes, sir.

FLAGG: [Up and business-like] Going in an hour. You know what that means.

MOORE: Yes, sir.

FLAGG: Pass the word to our platoon commanders to stand in heavy packs in thirty minutes. The camions are waiting at the crossroad with ammunition. [Moore goes out] Kiper, tell Quirt to salvage all rations in the square. [Kiper starts for door but stops as Flagg says, "Wait a minute"] Don't let on to Quirt we're going in. We'll marry him to Charmaine and march the blushing bridegroom off to war.

[Walks up and down]

FERGUSON: Afraid you can't marry them this evening, Captain Flagg. Chaplain very sticky on that point. Have to be married in the morning.

FLAGG: Well, then, the mayor could marry them, couldn't he? Lipinsky, go get the mayor. Who's seen the mayor to-day?

KIPER: Just saw him down by the bridge on a load of manure.

FLAGG: There you are, Lipinsky—load of manure, near the bridge. Get the mayor, dust him off, and bring him here toot pronto. If the chaplain can't do it, the mayor can.

[Lipinsky starts to go out but halts and calls "Tenshun." Pete still sits on stool. In walk a Brigadier-General, one Colonel, one Captain, and two Lieutenants]

THE GENERAL: Hello, Flagg. Haven't you received that order yet? Not a soul stirring on your damned street. [All salute] Flagg, you run the most disreputable outfit of the brigade. I come into town to hold a staff conference and find the whole shebang asleep. What kind of platoon commanders have you got, anyway, sitting round here like a nest of hobos when you're moving in forty-five minutes?

[The staff remains standing at attention]

FLAGG: Just got the order, General. We'll get off in time. Never missed a train in my life.

THE GENERAL: Well, I don't see how you do it. Camions back two miles at the crossroads. Your men will have ammunition there, and I want every man to carry two extra bandoliers.

FLAGG: If you don't mind my saying so, General, we're the refuse of the brigade back of the line and we carry extra bandoliers into it.

THE GENERAL: Well, I'll tell you why. Division wants a line straightened that we're going to take over. Isn't straight enough for him. Where's the map? Map, Davis!

THE COLONEL: [Turns] Map, Tolbert!

THE LIEUTENANT: Map, Price!

THE CAPTAIN: Where's that map? [Looks wildly around. The last Lieutenant to enter hands map to Price] Here's the map, sir.

[Hands map to General]

THE GENERAL: Good boy, good boy. A map, after all, among you soldiers. Now, see here, Flagg. [Pointing to map, which he spreads out on table] There she is, and here's the line. The corps wants it straightened out. It will take the steel, the cold steel. But they've got to have it straightened out. Give them the steel and you can do it. You'll hold the town—our half of it—and you'll get these fellows out if it takes a week. Your men are a bunch of tramps, but they can do this sort of thing.

FLAGG: Individualists, General, individualists.

THE GENERAL: Well, it's the penalty you pay for laxity. I admit it has its compensations. But you've got to give 'em the steel. You've got to run 'em down like rats. You give them the old cowering point. We've got to get them out. We want to go in there and run 'em out. We want to give 'em steel.

FLAGG: We? Staff going in there too, General? THE GENERAL: [Disconsolately] No—they won't risk us fellows, curse the luck.

FLAGG: That's too bad, General.

THE GENERAL: But we'll be behind you, Flagg.

FLAGG: How far, General?

THE GENERAL: We'll probably be at Cemetery Farm. We haven't studied the indirect fire properly yet, but we'll be behind you.

THE COLONEL: [Handing bundle of posters to General] Beg pardon, sir; these posters.

THE GENERAL: And, Flagg, some Yankee Doodle back in Hoboken sends you some posters with his compliments.

FLAGG: Posters? What for?

THE GENERAL: To post behind the German lines—sent to all companies of this brigade.

FLAGG: My God! What are we advertising? Camels?

THE GENERAL: Oh, no! It's intelligence work. Explaining our mission over here to the German soldier. There are three hundred posters. Send a small detail through the German lines some night and tack 'em up all over the place.

FLAGG: How many men am I supposed to lose on that job?

THE GENERAL: Not one. We don't want to lose a man. But tack 'em up.

FLAGG: Yeah, that's easy to say. I'd like to tack up a few in Hoboken containing my sentiments on twostarred idiots who waste men on that kind of monkey-business.

THE GENERAL: Well, here is another thing, Flagg, the big G. one wants a prisoner out of that town of yours. Wants an officer from one of those Alsatian regiments where the deserters are filtering through. And I've got to get him.

FLAGG: Oh, don't say that, General, don't break our hearts. I've got to get him. I knew damn well you had a bolt of black crepe up your sleeve when you came in the door.

THE GENERAL: Hold down the losses, Flagg ... and listen. If you send me one of those Alsatian officers in good condition I'll send your whole company back for a month's rest.

FLAGG: You mean it?

THE GENERAL: Mean it! You know me, Flagg. I'll do more if you get me an officer without a scratch. I'll give you eight days in any hotel in France. If you weren't such a bum, Flagg, I'd put you on staff.

FLAGG: I've been a bum, General, but I'm damned if I'd go on staff.

THE GENERAL: [At the door] Hold down the losses, Flagg, and give 'em the steel—and don't forget those posters, for they're damned important—and if you fetch me that prisoner you get a month's rest and eight days' leave. [The door opens. In walk the Chaplain, Charmaine and Quirt, Mayor, Kiper, and Lipinsky] Hullo! My God, what's this? A wedding party?

FLAGG: Why, yes, General. I don't suppose we ought to wait for it, but it's a sort of special case and won't take long.

THE GENERAL: You aren't getting married, are you, Flagg?

FLAGG: Not this trip; no sir. It's Sergeant Quirt. THE GENERAL: [Turning to Quirt] Oh, yes, I remember Sergeant Quirt very well.

FLAGG: I didn't like to intrude company matters when you were in haste, General, but the truth is, Sergeant Quirt has expressed a wish to marry the inn-keeper's daughter here, and her father was waiting to press charges; so, you see—

THE GENERAL: Oh! Charges? . . .

FLAGG: Personally, I'm opposed to Quirt's marrying at all, but he insists his intentions were honorable, and he's such a fine soldier I should hate to carry this old man to H.Q. with a complaint.

THE GENERAL: What's this, Sergeant?

QUIRT: A courtship, General; a love match from the start. Honorable intentions on both sides.

THE GENERAL: Sounds a little fishy to me, I must say, but go right ahead. Don't waste time.

[Ferguson comes forward]

PETE: Monsieur le général, les Américains sont si forts—ils m'ont déshonoré—ma petite fille—ma fleur charmante—ma fleur délicate . . .

FERGUSON: In case of a marriage, Captain Flagg, a little allotment is regulation.

FLAGG: Thanks, Fergy; I almost forgot the allotment.

QUIRT: Hell, we don't need no allotment. This is a love match.

FLAGG: Of course, it holds us up a bit, but if the General doesn't mind?

FERGUSON: A little allotment is regulation, sir. THE GENERAL: Go ahead, go ahead.

FLAGG: Ferguson, where are those allotment blanks?

THE GENERAL: [To Ferguson] Make it out for twothirds of the sergeant's pay, Ferguson.

FERGUSON: [Sits and fills papers] Yes, sir.

QUIRT: [Standing, with Charmaine] I don't know about this, General.

THE GENERAL: It's for your own good, Quirt. How do you plan to get out of it, otherwise?

QUIRT: Get out of it? Didn't I tell you it was a love match?

THE GENERAL: No more talk, Sergeant; sign up or stand trial.

FLAGG: For your own good, Quirt. QUIRT: For whose good, Captain Flagg?

THE GENERAL: Sign up, Quirt.

[Ferguson gives paper to Flagg. Quirt reluctantly signs]

FLAGG: All in order. [Looks over paper] Shipshape, Sergeant Quirt. Beautiful hand you write, sir. And now, Chaplain, Sergeant Quirt is next.

THE GENERAL: Let's get it over with. And here's her father ready to give her away.

PETE: Merci, mon général.

THE GENERAL: A regular church wedding, and Captain Flagg can be best man.

FLAGG: Get that, Sergeant Quirt? Charmaine [He crosses and hands her allotment papers with a bow], keep this in a good safe place. It means money to you the first of every month.

CHARMAINE: Merci.

THE GENERAL: Turn on the ceremony.

CHAPLAIN: Run it through. Sorry we can't wait to kiss the bride, Quirt. You have about twenty minutes, Flagg.

FLAGG: Right, sir.

THE GENERAL: One word, Quirt. You're going in to-night. You're going in in twenty minutes. If you take your men into the line in first-rate condition, looking like soldiers, you'll square yourself with me. Keep that in mind.

QUIRT: We're going in in twenty minutes?

THE GENERAL: Yes. We're off, men. So long, Flagg. Twenty minutes.

FLAGG: Good-bye, General.

[All salute. The General and his retinue file out at door]

CHAPLAIN: Do you, Charmaine, take this man for your husband, to love, honor—

QUIRT: She does not, I do not, we do not. So we're going in in twenty minutes, eh—and you were going to tie me up before I knew anything about it? And I suppose if I don't marry her you'll lock me up. If you think you can take your men in to-night without a first sergeant, you lock me up. I would like to see you take this gang of tiny tots across that last two miles without a sergeant. Well, if this sergeant goes in, he goes in single; so you God-damn well better make up your mind what you're going to do.

FLAGG: Well, skunk, you've got me. You win. Hit the deck.

QUIRT: Sorry, Charmaine, but I've got work to do. I can't marry you to-night, I can't marry you any God-damn time at all, and if I never see you again—why, then I never see you again, understand? What's more, don't you try cashing that allotment, or by God I'll pull something that'll stop my pay for good. Get out of my way.

[He goes out. Instantly a whistle blows]

FLAGG: Sorry, Charmaine, but I need that sergeant. Shake a leg, you hayshakers. Pass the word for inspection in five minutes, and they'd better be shipshape. Camions at the crossroad. Extra bandoliers and V.B. grenades for the outside ranks. Don't let Quirt do all the work.

THE RUNNERS: Ay ay, sir.

[They go out hastily]

PETE: [Angry] Sont-ils mariés? Ou votre sergeant, se moque-t-il de moi?

FLAGG: Sure, they're married.

PETE: [Beats on table] Prenez garde! Je viendrai! FLAGG: [Turns—speaks ominously] Don't bother me. Don't get in my way, see? We're fighting a war with Germany. I don't give a damn whether he's married or not. Run along outside. [Turns Pete around; spanks him] I'm busy. [Pete goes out, stops near Charmaine and says, "Sale vache"; then goes out. Flagg goes to table, gets his hat, turns toward the door] So long, Fergy. Take care of the stuff.

FERGUSON: Yes, sir.

[Turns to desk. Flagg starts out. Charmaine crosses to him]

CHARMAINE: [Her hand on his arm] I'm so sorry. You should have taken me to Paris. I told you to take me to Paris. I could not be good all alone.

FLAGG: [Takes her by shoulders] That's all right, Charmaine. You're a damn fine little animal. Go right on having a good time. It's a great life, and you've got a genius for it.

CHARMAINE: But you do not love me, not any more?

FLAGG: Sure I love you! Everybody loves you. CHARMAINE: You think I am pas bonne?

FLAGG: Listen, Charmaine. Don't you worry any more about Quirt and me. It's a thousand to one you'll never see either of us again. I'm damned sorry I have to take your sergeant away, but this war's lousy with sergeants. There'll be thirty along in thirty days. Anyway you'll probably never see us again. Kiss me good-bye. [They kiss] Now you forget me!

CHARMAINE: I never forget you.
[A whistle blows outside]

FLAGG: You won't forget me? Well, if I get leave, Charmaine . . . you never can tell. [The whistle blows twice] It's a hell of a war, but it's the only one we've got.

[He goes out. She stands staring after him] FERGUSON: [From his table; turning] Well, little missy. You're a single woman with an allotment. There ain't many as fortunate as that.

CHARMAINE: He will come back?

FERGUSON: Which one? CHARMAINE: The captain.

FERGUSON: Not likely. Not likely either of them will. A soldier hardly ever doubles on his trail in this war.

CHARMAINE: No?

FERGUSON: Hardly ever. And you're just as fortunate you didn't marry a soldier, darling. They're a bad lot to keep house for. I know. I've been keeping house for one regiment or another since I was as young as you are.

CHARMAINE: Oh, but they are beautiful.

FERGUSON: The girls always like them. I don't know why.

CHARMAINE: They go into hell to die—and they are not old enough to die.

FERGUSON: I shouldn't think it would matter much to you, dear. Some get killed, but plenty more come in to relieve them. Never any shortage of soldiers.

CHARMAINE: It's terrible!

FERGUSON: It's their business. Some of 'em get killed at it, same as in any trade.

CHARMAINE: [Crosses to back of Ferguson's chair; leans over him] Can I help you?

FERGUSON: No.

CHARMAINE: To-morrow?

FERGUSON: No.

CHARMAINE: You are unkind.

FERGUSON: Just because I'm the only man around here do you think I'm going to let you bother me? You run along home and pray God to keep you out of mischief a few days. It won't do you any harm.

[He bends over his work]

CHARMAINE: Bon soir. [He does not hear her] Bon soir!

FERGUSON: What? CHARMAINE: Bon soir.

FERGUSON: Oh, yes, good night. [She slowly crosses to door, looking back at him all the way. She quietly closes door, and just as she does so, Ferguson very loudly says, "Good night." He bends over his desk, alone, writing and sings]

"The French they are a funny race, parlez-vous, The French they are a funny race, parlez-vous . . ."

CURTAIN

ACT II.

A cellar in a disputed town, a typical deep wine cellar of a prosperous farmhouse on the edge of a village in France. It resembles half of a culvert thirty feet in diameter, with a corresponding curved roof and walls. One end is open, and the other is walled up, admitting a narrow and rather low door in the center, through which a flight of stairs extends to the ground floor above. This cellar is lit dimly by two candles placed at either side of the front stage and held in bottle on small bully-beef boxes. The rear wall can only barely be discerned. Along the sides of this culvert are dirty white ticks stuffed with straw for sleeping quarters, the sort of ticks headquarters detachment men carry about with them. There are four on each side, arranged with all the litter of miscellany a soldier carries about tucked at their heads, and with the foot of these pallets extending into the center of the culvert. The effect is not unlike in design that of a hospital ward, with feet toward the center aisle. Back of Flagg's bunk all manner of stuff-first-aid kits, bandages, chocolates, sticks, pistols and rifles, notes, books of memoranda, etc.

Two men are asleep, snoring gently—gas masks at alert on chests, tin hats on back of heads, and heads on floor. They are indescribably dirty, and with six or eight days' beard.

The two men are Spike and Kiper. Kiper is on second bunk at left, Spike on third bunk at right. Gowdy enters. Stirs Spike with his foot.

GOWDY: All right. Heave out and lash up. Lively now. Rations are in. Go draw for ten. At the gray stable to-night. Take that sack there.

[Points to a muddy sack on the floor near by]

SPIKE: What time is it? Rations in?

GOWDY: You heard me, Spike. Shake a leg and go draw rations for ten men, at the gray stable near the square. It's after two o'clock.

SPIKE: Where's Captain Flagg? GOWDY: Down tying up Mr. Aldrich.

SPIKE: So they got him. Bad?

GOWDY: I'll say they did. A ticket home. Right arm torn all to hell.

SPIKE: A damned dirty shame. He's lucky, though, to get out with an arm. I'd sell 'em mine, and at the same price. What was it—that one-pounder again?

GOWDY: No. Fuse cap from a grenade. Made a hell of a mess on Mr. Aldrich. He was crawling on the embankment near the railway station, and somebody inside threw him a present.

SPIKE: [Now up and re-winding a spiral legging] A damned swell officer, if you ask me. Taking him out to-night?

GOWDY: No. The skipper is bringing him here. Send him out to-morrow night. He's lost too much blood to walk it before dawn. God, it's getting on my nerves.

KIPER: [Who has been awakened] Who? Mr. Aldrich hit bad?

GOWDY: Pretty bad. Arm. Make a bunk for him, willya? Shake it down and pile another in the back. He'll want to sit up with it. Make up Harry's bunk.

SPIKE: [At door, about to go upstairs, turns at this] Harry's bunk? Why, Harry?

GOWDY: Harry's through with bunks.

SPIKE: Bumped off?

GOWDY: Worse. In the belly crossing the square.

[Spike goes out]
KIPER: Where is he?

GOWDY: The skipper rushed him back an hour ago. No use, though; Harry was unconscious—half-way—holding half his guts in his bare hands and hollering for somebody to turn him loose so he could shoot himself.

KIPER: Captain Flagg want me?

GOWDY: He said not to wake you. Might need you later on KIPER: A good job for me, I suppose. Jeez, with this daylight saving I ain't going to live forever, that's sure. I think I'll go crazy and get the doc to gimme a ticket.

GOWDY: Flagg's crazy now. Raving crazy, Hasn't slept for five nights. We'll be sitting on him in another night like he's had to-night.

KIPER: The whole damned universe is crazy now. [Kiper has come forward to Flagg's bunk, smoking. Enter Pharmacist's Mate, with a large clothing roll trussed up in leather straps with a portmanteau handle. He is young, pinkfaced, but horribly callous, probably some kid from a medical school of 1917]

MATE: [Looking about in the dark as he approaches Kiper] Flagg's company P.C.?

KIPER: [Hostile; Gowdy sits up] Yeah.

MATE: Where'd I better set up shop, soldier?

[He looks about the cellar]

KIPER: [Worried] What do you want to set up shop for, sailor?

MATE: [Sitting down on bunk; starts unpacking, takes off helmet] How'd I know? This ain't my party. Flagg wants it here.

KIPER: What's he want it for to-night?

MATE: He's going to put on a little party before morning. [He uncovers a litter of blue-rolled bandages on bunk; absorbent cotton, a jar of iodine which he unscrews, and some wooden sticks around which he begins to twist wisps of cotton for daubs] A little party.

KIPER: The whole damn company, I suppose, and all the engineers he can find to boot.

MATE: [Professionally] Oh, no. He ain't got arrangements here for that many. I'd say a small party, according to the stuff they gave me at the dressing station.

KIPER: [Incredulous] How small?

MATE: [With immense indifference, busy about his detail] Oh, I'd say about two operating tables . . . [A pause as he enjoys the effect on Kiper] A small party. About four couples for bridge.

KIPER: Yeah. [Rather miserable] Low bridge around that lousy railroad station.

MATE: I guess so. They were passing out V.B. grenades down the street to the station when I came through.

KIPER: [Immensely friendly all of a sudden] Look here, sailor. You are smarter than me. . . .

MATE: [Interrupting] Oh, no!

KIPER: [Insistently] Oh, hell, yes! Any man smart enough not to join in them four couples is smarter than I am. Even you're smarter. Now that being the case, tell me why the hell we want the Heinies out of that God-damn railway station. Leave 'em there, I say. Let 'em sit where they damned well are. They ain't going anywheres.

MATE: I can't tell you.

KIPER: Nobody can. Like as not General Pershing himself couldn't tell you about it . . . and . . . oh, sweet baby, but last night down there I swore to God so long as I lived I'd never let another German in that railroad station throw a potato masher at me.

MATE: You can throw a grenade at him.

KIPER: Sure I can. But I don't want to no more. I pitched yesterday, and my arm is sore. I know I can do it, and it ain't fun any more. I know all about Flagg's invitations to parties. I know why they all got R.S.V.P. on 'em. Right smart of V.B. grenades provided. . . .

[Enter Lipinsky, who comes down; looks first at Kiper]

LIPINSKY: [Immediately perceiving the litter] Jeez, Kiper, I wish you'd keep the undertakers out of here. What's all this, Jack?

[He waves to the mate's stuff]

MATE: [Selecting a small bandage] Well, this one is yours, and the rest is for your friends.

LIPINSKY: [Cheerily] Don't try to put the bug on me. I ain't no queen bee. They ain't made one that could burst alongside of me. If they'd made it, I'd be down with the daisies long ago. I'm proof now. It's down in the cards that I'll live to see the navy at Mare Island again. [He lights a cigarette which he has taken from Flagg's bunk] Yes, sir, I'll live to beat the pants off that bird that sold me the wrist watch down by the main gate.

KIPER: How do you know you're going to live? Said your prayers, I suppose, and got an answer.

LIPINSKY: And who'd send me an answer?

KIPER: The great cosmic top sergeant who runs this world.

LIPINSKY: Well, I don't want any answer from that bird. He'd send the answer collect, and it would say, "Fall in and get the manure outa the French angels' backyards. Clean up heaven, you lowdown Marine.

so's the National Guard won't get typhoid when they all die and come here."

KIPER: There ain't any heaven. Paris is heaven enough. If I ever get out hell, I'm certainly going to stay in heaven until I die.

LIPINSKY: Of course, there's a heaven.

MATE: On the level, now. You birds know your souls go somewheres. You've seen too many men die. A fellow is walking along, blood in his face and breath in his lungs, and whizz - eeee - zzzz, boommmmm . . . he's down on the ground and something's gone. Something's gone, I tell you. Something that was in that bird a minute before has left, and all you've got is a pack of bloody rags and a lot of dirt. Well, for the want of a better name, you call that something a soul . . . and you can't kid me . . . the soul's gone somewheres.

KIPER: What of it? That soul ain't any of my business. It ain't got to eat, it ain't got to run; it ain't got to stand in line ten days a week to sign the payroll. I should get on my ear about where this doodlebug in my chest is going after I die. It ain't never helped me none. It can go to hell for all I care.

LIPINSKY: Jeez, Kiper, don't talk that way around me. [Raises eyes] It wasn't me, God; it wasn't your little Vladysek Lipinsky. Not him. He knows too damn well if he was to talk that way you would certainly make him cover up and yell for mercy before morning.

KIPER: And you were the one wasn't going to be hit a while ago.

LIPINSKY: That's why I ain't going to be hit. My little soul's all ready to turn out for every formation, boots blacked and buttons shined. A little seagoing soul that knows its top sergeant can give it a kick in the pants any time he gets ready.

KIPER: Well, if there is a God, he ain't got medicine big enough to worry me. Why the hell doesn't he win the war for one side or the other and get this mess over? I know plenty of men could win it. Flagg probably could, if you gave him the army and a barrel of whiskey.

LIPINSKY: But you like the chaplain, Kiper. You said he was a swell bird the other day.

KIPER: Sure I like the chaplain. Gimme two packs of Camels two nights ago. If God was to show himself, now-come down with a bunch of angels driving a wagon-load of cigarettes, that would be something like it. The chaplain said my folks was all praying for me to come through, and for God to spare me after hearing their prayers. God, I ain't that dirty a coward! That's a case of saying, "Oh, God, don't kill our child. Kill every kid in the neighborhood, but bring the one marked Kiper safe back home. . . ." No, I don't want none of that for mine. . . . And you can take all your New Testaments with the khaki backs and throw 'em in the incinerator so far as I want anything out of 'em. I'd rather have a book of cigarette papers any time. ... I ain't asking anybody for a damned thing in this war. And you can take all your Bible backers and psalm singers and hitch 'em to the ration wagons, if you ask me.

MATE: Well, this is all very pleasant, but I got business over in the next company now. Bad curve in the position there, and 'long toward daybreak they start hollering "First Aid" as regular as a clock. If I was you fellows I'd go out and sleep in different shell-holes to-night . . . see which one of you is right. . . . Tell your skipper I'll be back around three-thirty.

[He steps on his cigarette and prepares to go out after Quirt enters, which he does. Quirt enters. Sergeant Quirt is tired]

QUIRT: Captain Flagg here?

GOWDY: Still in the orchard . . . digging those new rifle pits. We've got nine captured Maxims there. Those birds can't change the belts, but they can tap a thousand rounds apiece by pressing the buttons in the dark. Fifteen men could hold this half of the town, the way he's got the positions staked out.

QUIRT: There'll be about fifteen holding it if this business of reconnoitering patrols keeps up. I'd like to have that divisional staff in this town one night. Still bad in the square?

GOWDY: Pretty bad. Rifles in box rest in the rail-way stations . . . light automatics.

QUIRT: I thought Flagg got 'em out last night.

GOWDY: They filtered back in at dusk to-night. Our cross-fire couldn't stop 'em. The skipper says they are working them from pulleys from the first floor, and the railroad embankment covers them from us.

QUIRT: [Stretching out and sighing as he takes off his tin hat and mops his forehead] Running rations down that ravine every night is the toughest job I've ever soldiered.

gowdy: Lucky to-night?

QUIRT: Pretty lucky. Six out of ten come back. Them two Jameson boys got it from the same shell going down. Dutchy and the little Jew were hit right at the dump. Easy ones, though. They'll be back in ten days.

[A commotion at head of stairs. Enter Captain Flagg supporting Aldrich by gripping Aldrich's uninjured wrist over his shoulder and easing him gently down steps. Aldrich is not groaning. After all, it won't hurt for fifteen minutes or so. But he is weak from loss of blood and soaked through, and is in an indescribable mess of dried blood and dirt, which appears black. Flagg, who is unkempt, has no leggings or laces in his breeches, these flapping in the most disillusioning fashion about his bare legs. His blouse, an old army blouse many sizes too big and without a sign of any insignia, is tied with a piece of twine. He is bareheaded-no tin hat and no accoutrements of any sort. He is a very weary-looking man. He wears belt and holster with automatic bound to leg. As Flagg enters, followed by Mate, Gowdy jumps up and spreads blanket on bunk!

FLAGG: Right here, Aldrich. [Lowers him down on bunk. The Pharmacist's Mate follows him. Flagg kneels above Aldrich. The Mate stands] Gimme a stick of that dope, Holsen.

MATE: They are quarter grains, Captain.

FLAGG: [To Aldrich, lying down] Take these two now. [He puts two tablets from a tiny vial in the wounded officer's mouth] I'm putting these in your blouse. Get somebody to give you one every three hours until you are carried out.

ALDRICH: What are they?

FLAGG: Morphine—quarter grains—

ALDRICH: [Not dramatic, just casual] What if I take them all when your back is turned?

FLAGG: [Turning his back and crossing to his own bunk down left; sits on bunk] Go ahead. It's your affair.

[After Flagg is seated on his bunk a strange sob is heard at the head of the stairs. Lieutenant Moore, last seen in company headquarters, rushes in and goes straight over to Aldrich, where he stands and looks down at his arm, and not his face]

MOORE: Oh, God, Dave, but they got you. God. but they got you a beauty, the dirty swine. God DAMN them for keeping us up in this hellish town. Why can't they send in some of the million men they've got back there and give us a chance? Men in my platoons are so hysterical every time I get a message from Flagg, they want to know if they're being relieved. What can I tell them? They look at me like whipped dogs-as if I had just beaten them -and I've had enough of them this time. I've got to get them out, I tell you. They've had enough. Every night the same way. [He turns to Flagg] And since six o'clock there's been a wounded sniper in the tree by that orchard angel crying "Kamerad! Kamerad!" Just like a big crippled whippoorwill. What price glory now? Why in God's name can't we all go home? Who gives a damn for this lousy, stinking little town but the poor French bastards who live here? God damn it! You talk about courage, and all night long you hear a man who's bleeding to death on a tree calling you "Kamerad" and asking you to save him. God damn every son of a bitch in the world, who isn't here! I won't stand for it. I won't stand for it! I won't have the platoon asking me every minute of the livelong night when they are going to be relieved. . . . Flagg, I tell you you can shoot me, but I won't stand for it. . . . I'll take 'em out to-night and kill you if you get in my way. . . .

[Starts sobbing again. Gowdy and Kiper sit up] FLAGG: [Rising quickly as though he might kill the man, and then putting his arm around the chap, who has clearly gone smash for a few minutes. He speaks in a quiet, chastening tone, with a gentility never before revealed] Here, boy, you can't do this before all these men. [Walks him] They are rubbed up, too. You are all tuckered out with your side of the line. Don't worry about your platoon. We'll get them out. You turn in here. [Walks him to bunk on the left side of the room. Kiper crosses and throws blanket on him; stops at bunk nearest entrance] And dope off for a little while . . . that's it, give him a blanket, Kiper . . . and now take it easy a while, and you can go back to your platoon in time to stand to. Sleep it off, boy, sleep it off. . . . You're in a deep wide hole, and shells can't get you. Sleep it off.

[Flagg crosses to his own bunk, lights cigarette at candle, seats himself on bunk. Gowdy rests

head on arm. Quirt kneels on floor, gets a piece of chocolate out of his pocket; rises, as though his legs were asleep. He carries his helmet. He crosses and tosses candy to Moorel QUIRT: Just a little chocolate I bought off a Y.M.C.A. wagon down at the base. [Quirt is sympathetic and begins to talk nervously] I got hit myself once. In Nicaragua. We were washed up before we made a landing. I was a corporal, and when we were scrubbing down and putting on clean uniforms -doctors' orders, you know, so they wouldn't have to wash us when we were hit-[Turns to Gowdy]a bird said to me—it was old Smoke Plangetch, who was killed in 1913 in a chippie joint in Yokohama -Smoke said to me: "You'd better swab down. you son of a sea-bitch, because I dreamed last night they wrote your name on a bullet." I said to him, "The bullet ain't been cast that can shoot Micky Quirt." He said, "If your name is on one, it will turn the corner and go upstairs to find you." Jeez! That afternoon when we made a landing and hit the beach, the spigs was on a hill five hundred vards off shore. We started up the hill—they weren't many of us dropping—and I came to a log I had to jump [Quirt illustrates this] and I lost my balance and threw my hand up in the air. [Quirt extends his wrist] Look, right through the God-damn fin, as pretty as a pinwheel . . . Smoke saw it. "Oh, yeah, you wisenheimer son of a Chinese tart," he says to me, "your name was on that one and you had to reach up for it." [Gowdy laughs. Quirt is obviously embarrassed by having spoken of himself so much. He turns and recollects his business and goes over to Flagg. Crosses to the foot of Flagg's bunk] Rations detail in, sir. Lost the two Jameson boys in the ravine going down. Both badly hit. Lost Fleischman and Rosenthal in the dump. Both slight. Brought back all the ammunition and two sacks of bread, one of canned willie, French; I carried a sack of beet sugar on my back. Got a piece of shrapnel in it where they are shelling the crossroads—stopped it square. In the next war, I'm going to wear a suit of beet sugar and stand forest fire watch in the Rocky Mountains. [He turns, and then remembers and comes back] Oh, I brought up two of these thirtyday-wonder lieutenants from a training camp. Sent up by divisional for instruction.

FLAGG: By God, I won't stand for it. They wipe their damned dirty feet on this company. They can give my men all their damned good jobs. They can keep us in the line all during the whole damned war. But I'll be damned if my sergeants have got time to teach army lieutenants how to button their pants in the dark.

QUIRT: They are in my hole now, sir. Pretty badly shaken up by the ravine. First time up, you know. Shall I send them to you, sir?

FLAGG: Send them to me, and for God's sake, don't call me sir any more to-night.

QUIRT: [To Gowdy] All right. You heard him. Hit the deck. You'll find 'em in my hole. [Gowdy goes] Those Huns in the railway station again?

FLAGG: Try to cross the town square when there's a flare up, and you'll see.

QUIRT: You get a visit from brigade headquarters to-night. I saw their party in the ravine as we were going down to the dump.

FLAGG: The old man says we've got to drive them off the embankment. Huh! He can give me five general courts and I'll not waste another man at that business. It will take a brigade action to get them out for good.

QUIRT: Do you mind if I take a look around there now? I'd like to see this damned war some. For six days I've been a lousy bakery wagon—haven't seen a spiggoty yet, except stinking dead ones—I never see soldiers stink like these Heinies.

FLAGG: All right. Go get your blooming can blown off. But bury yourself, while you're about it. The burying detail is in for the night.

QUIRT: Gosh, I wish to hell I was home.

FLAGG: Go get one of those Alsatian lootnants then, and you'll get a leave.

QUIRT: I don't want to die yet, thanking you just the same. Well, here goes.

[Exit]

FLAGG: Well, keep your head down. I can't waste any grave-diggers on sergeants. [Flagg shrugs his shoulders and walks over to above Aldrich] Sorry Moore blew up that way, Aldrich . . . you are a damned sight luckier than he is, but he doesn't know it. I'll have you out to-morrow night with the ration detail, and you'll be parking your body in a big white bed in another two days. Good luck . . . You've been a damned good man. I wish you could get a ribbon for this town.

[As Flagg leaves, Gowdy enters with two lieutenants. They are just like tailor's dummies of a Burberry outfit, slicked to the notch and perky and eager. As they enter, Flagg steps on his cigarette and stands facing them. The Lieutenants come down and stand side by side]

FLAGG: [Starts back in mock admiration and salaams deeply as they come forward] So this is the last of the old guard, eh? In the name of the holy sweet Jumping, are you gentlemen bound for a masked ball, that you come disguised as officers? Or do you wish to save the snipers the trouble of picking you off with a glass, that you wear signboards? [He goes nearer them, inspecting their clothes] Can't you go without those trench coats even to the trenches? How long will you last in those boots? Take 'em off before you even part your hair in the morning. . . . [He changes to a thundering staccato] My name is Flagg, gentlemen, and I'm the sinkhole and cesspool of this regiment frowned on in the Y.M.C.A. huts and sneered at by the divisional Beau Brummells. I am a lousy. good-for-nothing company commander. I corrupt youth and lead little boys astray into the black shadows between the lines of hell, killing more men than any other company commander in the regiment, and drawing all the dirty jobs in the world. I take chocolate soldiers and make dead heroes out of them. I did not send for you, Mister . . . [He leans forward, and the first officer salutes and speaks: "Cunningham, sir"] nor for you . . . ["Lundstrom, sir," also salutes]; and I confess I am in a quandary. Four days ago I should have been more hospitable, for I had four gunnery sergeants then. Now I have two, and can't spare them to teach little boys how to adjust their diapers. I've no doubt that one of you was an all-American half-back and the other the editor of the college paper, but we neither follow the ball nor the news here. We are all dirt, and we propose to die in order that corps headquarters may be decorated. I should be happy to receive suggestions as to what should be done with you. Ah, I have it! There are two German gunners over in the enemy railway station. Two bright young men might get them out and cut their throats before dawn; then no more could get in the station all day. Two bright young men, who know very little of anything just yet. I have two bright ones, but they are far too valuable. They are corporals with ten years' experience.

[The Lieutenants are speechless. There is not a smile in the cellar. Cunningham, who is the bigger of the two, finally answers, in a slow Southern drawl]

CUNNINGHAM: I'll do anything you will. Where is the railway station and the two bucks that have got you buffaloed?

FLAGG: Why, it's Frank Merriwell! All right, Frank. You and me will be playing ball in hell by three o'clock this morning.

LUNDSTROM: Put me in too, sir.

FLAGG: Oh, no, no, no! We must have officers left. Rule of the game. Must have officers. Men would get right up and go home, and then there wouldn't be any war at all. Besides, three would be a crowd, and I hate crowds early in the morning around the railway station. They are so noisy, and they die so fast. [He turns to Gowdy] Gowdy! Take Mr. Lundstrom to the fourth platoon sergeant, and tell him that here's his new officer. [Runner and Lundstrom move to door. Flagg is all business now] And by the way, Mr. Lundstrom, they filter through and bomb twice a week, small parties slipping down that ravine you'll find on your left. Watch it closely, or you'll all have your throats cut before you know it. And let that sergeant sleep for the next two days. Remember, he'll do no details until he's rested. Of course you can wake him for advice. That's all. Shove off. [Runner and Lundstrom salute, and go out. Cunningham sits down. Quirt enters with his helmet on, limping; steals forward quietly, and sits down on his bunk. There is a nice bloody mess on his right calf. Flagg happens to turn, sees what's going on, sits up, watches Quirt. Quirt looks back. finally grins, then tries to open a first-aid pack]

FLAGG: What's the matter with you?

QUIRT: Got a can opener?

FLAGG: You crook!

QUIRT: I say, Captain, got a can opener?

FLAGG: Those things are supposed to be opened with the teeth.

QUIRT: You don't say! Well, this'n' wasn't. This here can was evidently made for the Red Cross by the Columbia Red Salmon Company. Like as not instead of bandages I'll find the God-damnedest mess of goldfish in it.

FLAGG: [Rises, crosses to Quirt, takes can away from him] Where were you? [He comes over, strains at the tin. He is looking daggers] Where were you?

QUIRT: Just looking around.

FLAGG: Here.

[Hands him tin, opened]

QUIRT: Thanks.

FLAGG: Where were you, I said.

QUIRT: [Takes out bandage] In the vegetable garden, pulling turnips.

[Starts wiping leg]

FLAGG: God-damn you, Quirt, I believe you stuck your leg out.

[Goes back and sits on bunk]

QUIRT: Like hell I did. If I'd wanted to stick my leg out don't you think I've had plenty of chances to do it before? No, sir, I stuck my head out and some bird in the church tower took a shot at me. There she is. In and out without touching the bone. Just let me squeeze the juice out and she'll be all right. Ain't she the prettiest little damn puncture you ever saw, Captain? Ain't she a beauty?

FLAGG: I suppose you think you're going back to Cognac Pete's, huh?

QUIRT: How'd you guess it? Yes, sir, back to my little skookum lady you tried to make me a present of. Am I happy? Am I happy? Oh, boy! Ask me, Captain, am I happy?

FLAGG: You mean to say you aren't cured of Charmaine yet?

QUIRT: Cured of Charmaine? No, sir, I ain't even getting better. Oh, Captain Flagg, ain't you proud of yourself, ain't you a wizard? God, ain't I sorry to leave you all alone here in this mess? Think of her sitting on my lap, lighting my pipe in the kitchen, and you dodging machine guns. I wonder I don't bust out crying. You know, I wouldn't wonder if you got bumped off and never came back. As a matter of fact, I hope you damn well get your head blown off.

FLAGG: Yeah, you always did have a charming disposition.

QUIRT: [Squeezing his wound] Oh, pretty baby, papa doesn't mean to hurt you. Lookit, Captain. By God, I wouldn't take a hundred dollars Mex. for that little bumble-bee that flew in there.

FLAGG: Feel pretty cocky, don't you? Well, you can't go out to-night. I guess you can work all right with that. You'll wait here till Cunningham and I get back with that Alsatian shavetail from the railroad embankment. Then I get leave, the company gets a rest, and we go back together, see?

QUIRT: Not much, I don't see. I've got a very important engagement back to Pete's place. Can't be postponed, not even for the pleasure of your enjoyable company, such as it is. I don't wait for nothing in the world but a medical tag.

[Enter Pharmacist's Mate; stands on steps, leans head in door]

MATE: Heard your first sergeant was hit in that turnip patch. [Flagg indicates Quirt. Mate crosses to Quirt; kneels] Let's have a look. Um. Night soil in that patch, and you, like a damned fool, crawl after they hit you, and now you're full of that muck. Can you walk, Sergeant?

QUIRT: [Lying back] Well, depends on what I see. MATE: [Helps up Quirt, who carries helmet] Go to the sick bay at once for a shot of tetanus, and then get out of here. [Takes his arm, and both cross] You can reach a collecting station before you're done.

QUIRT: Ain't this heart-breaking, Flagg? Well, duty calls. But my eyes fill with tears at the thought of leaving my old company commander. I don't know as I can go through with it.

FLAGG: Make it snappy, Quirt, or you'll find the door locked.

QUIRT: Yeah? What door?

FLAGG: Charmaine's.

QUIRT: Are you wounded, too, Mr. Flagg?

FLAGG: No, but inside ten minutes I'm going to be wounded or bumped off or have that God-damned prisoner for the Brig.

QUIRT: Try to get killed, will you? To please me—just this once?

[Quirt and the Mate go out]

FLAGG: Mr. Cunningham . . . I guess you thought I was joking when I proposed that little expedition to the railroad embankments?

CUNNINGHAM: I did not. When do we start?

[Coming to Flagg]

FLAGG: Well, I was. I was kidding hell out of you. I'd no more let you go in there, boy. than I'd knife you in the back. The air is full of steel this side of that embankment, and a green man has about as much chance as a cootie on Fifth Avenue.

CUNNINGHAM: You going?

FLAGG: I've got official reasons for going, see? The Brig. wants a prisoner, and he also wants that nest wiped out. Also, I got private and personal reasons for wanting to catch up with that baboon that got the little present through his leg.

CUNNINGHAM: If you're going, that suits me. I ain't no green man. I can crawl on my belly.

FLAGG: Yeah?

CUNNINGHAM: I'm a locomotive engineer and I've been crawling under trains for fifteen years. Had several engines shot out from under me likewise. You think you can scare me with this here war? Christ! You ought to see a few railroad wrecks!

FLAGG: Well, Mr. Cunningham, I'm inclined to think you'll do.

CUNNINGHAM: You're God-damn right, I'll do. FLAGG: What do you say we black our faces and give a little party, now the guests will be asleep?

CUNNINGHAM: Sure. I like the cut of your jib, and you can lead me to it. Show me which one is the lootenant, so I won't hurt him.

FLAGG: You from Texas? CUNNINGHAM: You hit it.

FLAGG: Now I get you. So we've got another damned Texan in this outfit, wanting to fight anybody that ain't from Texas.

CUNNINGHAM: Yep, and I ain't no God-damn college boy, either.

FLAGG: Good stuff! Now throw away them fancy-dress clothes of yours and dip in here.

[He offers a can of lamp-black]

CUNNINGHAM: Sure. [Takes off overcoat] I was a locomotive engineer on the Louisiana Midland. Three wrecks in my division last year. Christ, but this war shore is a great relief to me. [Both black their faces] I'm an engineer officer attached to infantry. My brother's still driving an engine back home. Had a letter last month from him. He says, "You dirty yellow sapsucker, quitting your job on the Louisiana Midland. I knew you always were a yellow dog, but I didn't think you'd go back on the road thataway."

FLAGG: Now if I only had a pretty little engine. [Suddenly there is a scream upstairs, a shout in a burly strange tongue. "Heraus!" and three bombs explode. Flagg, the Runners, and all save Aldrich dash for the door] Marines! Marines! Marines! [The lieutenant who had been put to sleep stirs uneasily. After a brief tumult, the people of the cellar descend stairs, Flagg holding a German officer by the collar. He takes him straight to the candle] Let me have a look at you, sweetheart, let me have a look! Boys, he's an Alsatian lieutenant! He couldn't wait for us to go after him, so he came over. [He embraces his captive] Oh, sweetheart—you're the sweetest sight I've seen since Charmaine! Here, Kiper [Pushes him to Kiper]—take care of him for me, and for God's sake don't scare him to death, because he's our ticket of leave!

LEWISOHN: [Screams, outside] Captain Flagg . . .

FLAGG: Who's that?

LIPINSKY: It's little Lewisohn, sir.

[Lewisohn is carried in by Gowdy followed by Pharmacist's Mate, and he is crying monoton-ously for Captain Flagg]

LEWISOHN: Captain Flagg. Captain Flagg. Stop the blood. Stop the blood.

FLAGG: [Takes him from Gowdy and puts him on floor] I can't stop it, Lewisohn, I'm sorry.

[He examines wound in left side]

LEWISOHN: Oh, Captain Flagg, stop the blood. FLAGG: Fix him with your needle, Mate.

[Mate gives him needle in arm]

LEWISOHN: Oh, Captain Flagg, can't you please, sir, stop the blood?

FLAGG: [Puts hand behind Lewisohn's head and gently lowers him to floor] You'll be all right, boy. You'll be all right. You'll be all right.

[Lewisohn sighs and relaxes his body]

CURTAIN

ACT III.

A tavern known colloquially as Cognac Pete's. Evening, two days later. The outside door is in the rear, small bar at the right, stairway left, an inside door at right. Windows rear. Ferguson sits at long table smoking and playing solitaire, a bottle of Martell and a brandy pony at his elbow. Charmaine is in front of the table by the candles, sewing. Ferguson is enjoying the luxury of talking to himself, for it is apparent that Charmaine is not following all he says.

FERGUSON: I'm glad they're coming back here. [He sips, between sentences] It's a good, quiet town . . . quiet . . . last time we were in a town where the M.P.'s and the mule skinners fought every night . . . glad they sent 'em back here. . . . You ought to be. . . . Your father'll do a land office business when the outfit gets here. He better knock the bung in every barrel of red ink he's got. God, how they'll eat . . . what's left of 'em. When two hundred leave me behind with the stuff, I always get ready to mess two hundred when they return. Of course a hundred may not return . . . but they'll eat right through to the bottom of the kettle just the same. Now you take that big oakum-haired Swede named Swenson. I never see a Marine eat more than he did . . . I damn well hope Swenson gets back . . . I like to see him eat. There was a little Jew named Lewisohn that could out-eat him, weight for weight; but the Swede weighed twice as much. That Swede could cat anything but a horse collar. [He chuckles and Charmaine smiles] Well, I'll say we've kept each other company. We sure have, even if you can't speak a white man's lingo; that is, not to say speak it. Now if you'd been a Spanish girl we could have got together a little better . . . I lived with a Spanish girl at Cavite back in '99 . . . in those days I was salty as hell, a sea-going buckaroo.

CHARMAINE: Est-ce que . . . you are lonely? FERGUSON: It ain't so bad, staying behind this way. It ain't so bad. Twenty years now I've had 'em leave me. When I was younger I believed some of the liars who said they liked to fight . . . liked being under fire . . . but it always bored me to sit around and be sniped at. Somehow I never did get angry. And you've got to get angry when a bird's shooting at you if you're going to enjoy it. So I didn't have a good time . . . Now you take Flagg there . . . there's the sort likes it. Flagg gets mad as hell if you don't even like him, let alone shoot at him. Flagg and me are different. Now Flagg-

CHARMAINE: Where is le capitaine? FERGUSON: Pretty near here, I suppose.

CHARMAINE: Near here?

FERGUSON: He'll be here presently, General.

CHARMAINE: Le Capitaine Flagg—he has been wounded ever?

FERGUSON: Naw! Flagg ain't never been wounded. Never will, neither, if you ask me. You can't hurt his kind. When you see a man like Flagg, it's curious, but they always have the pleasure of drinking themselves to death . . . funny thing . . . I never knew a man who could float a load of liquor, didn't hold all the cards besides. Now you take Flagg . . . he'll be here in fifteen minutes mebbe—mebbe two hours—but just the same as ever . . . thirsty as hell, wishing he had forty geisha girls to play with.

CHARMAINE: Fifteen minutes. . . .

FERGUSON: [With elaborate gestures] Le Capitany . . . ici . . . sank . . . min-use ici, sank min-use . . . Compree?

CHARMAINE: Oui, oui, oui! Merci bien.

[She runs upstairs. Ferguson continues smoking, pouring a pony of brandy. Presently the door at rear opens slowly. Enter Sergeant Quirt in a major's army overcoat, with black braids and a leather-visored garrison cap. He is shaven, crafty-faced. Below the overcoat, which is bursting on his chest, may be seen rough army shoes, gray woolen socks pulled over the bottoms of striped outing-flannel pajamas. He looks exactly what he is, a slightly wounded soldier escaped from hospital in borrowed clothes. Ferguson turns, and seeing him, comes to attention. Quirt also has a bottle with about half a drink in it]

FERGUSON: [Rising courteously] Good evening, Major.

QUIRT: [Pours what remains in the bottle he carries into Ferguson's glass; then, taking the full bottle, sets his empty one in its place] Sit down, Fergy, and use your eyes. Help me to get out of this rigging.

FERGUSON: [Sitting; irritated] What are you doing in those gadgets, Quirt? Where's the outfit? Where you been to?

QUIRT: Listen. I ain't writing my memoirs of this war till it's over. All you need to know is, I got two M.P.'s on my trail, and I don't want to meet 'em in these.

[He removes his coat and is found to be in striped pajamas. A small red cross on the jumper pocket]

FERGUSON: You come from the lines in that outfit, Quirt? In night-drawers?

QUIRT: I suppose you think I go 'round this way because I like it. [He stows the overcoat and cap under the bench] Major, you're relieved. [Takes slicker from peg on stair rail] Lend me your slicker, Fergy. I'll give it back if it thunders.

[He goes to chair at table, seizes the cognac, pours out two ponies and swallows them, looks at Ferguson, then pours a third drink; drinks it] FERGUSON: Of course you're paying for those, Quirt, even if you have gone cuckoo.

QUIRT: All right, all right! Don't get on your ear about it . . . and now you want to know where I've been.

FERGUSON: Oh, no, if a soldier wants to campaign in a pair of night-drawers, it ain't none of my parade. It takes all kinds of sergeants to make an army.

QUIRT: [Drinking his third] You're too hard-hearted, Fergy. I ain't in my right mind. I was wounded, and now I've got aspasia. [Mysteriously] My name is Field Marshal von Hindenburg, and I'm looking for a wagonload of pants that got lost in shipment.

FERGUSON: Yeah?

QUIRT: Yeah, sure. I wandered outta a hospital about five miles over at a place called Noisy. It was damned well named too, Fergy. Noisy was no name for it when I came outta the ether after I'd shipped in there with a piece of pants driven through a bullet hole in my leg.

FERGUSON: Have to give you ether to take off your pants?

QUIRT: No. They gave me ether so the stretcher bearers could steal a gold watch and eight hundred bucks off me. I certainly put up a squawk when I woke up and found 'em missing. But a hell of a lot of good it did me. I went looking for the bird that got them and ran into a guy in a bartender's coat in the operating room. He tried to pipe me down and I hung a shanty on the bimbo's eye [Enjoying the picture himself] and when they washed him off he was a captain. So they locked me up, wound and all. And then I got aspasia, and here I am. You ain't seen me.

FERGUSON: No, I ain't seen you [Distant voices shouting "Fergy!" "When do we eat?" "Chow," etc.

At this sound, very faint, Quirt rises quickly, starting for the stairs with a skip and jump] Keep your drawers on, Quirt. They ain't no M.P.'s. That's the outfit. I've got old Pete and his brother down at the bridge, keeping coffee and slum hot for 'em. Better go and give yourself up to Flagg as soon as he drives in. You'll be safe then. I'd like to see a set of doctors take Flagg's first sergeant off him when he's just out of the lines. It surely would be a pretty sight afterwards, them doctors working on each other like monkeys. [The voices come nearer. The cry, long drawn out like a wolf's, comes from many throats: "Ch-o-o-o-w-w!"] That's me. They're calling for me. Well, old Fergy's got their chow, and hot too.

[He goes. Quirt limps quickly to door after Ferguson goes. Charmaine comes down the stairs at the same time]

QUIRT: [Turning to find Charmaine] Hello, Pitts-burgh.

CHARMAINE: [With a small cry, comes toward him] You are wounded.

QUIRT: Sure I'm wounded. Ain't that enough to put me nine miles ahead of Flagg with you? I certainly beat him here.

CHARMAINE: [Trying to put arms around his neck] Mais, mais... you are...

QUIRT: [Restraining her] Don't embarrass me, darling, because I ain't clothed and in my right mind. I just been waiting for Fergy to leave so I could steal a uniform from him. Where's his room? [Charmaine points to door] Wait a minute, dearie, until I salvage a pair of breeches. [He goes out. Charmaine goes to the outside door, where voices are now heard. Quirt reappears] Damn it, he's locked his chest! Gimme a ice pick.

[Quirt takes bottle from bar. There are steps and voices at the door, and Quirt withdraws hastily to the right, Charmaine following. Enter Kiper, Gowdy, and Lipinsky. Kiper spies the cognac bottle and holds it over his open gullet. The other two rush him. There is a tough scuffle]

KIPER: Lav off my bottle.

GOWDY: Say, don't drink it all! [All then sit behind the table and deliberately begin a tremendous racket]

KIPER: Hey! Vin rouge! Vin blanc! You, Pete! Venez ici. Toot sweet!

LIPINSKY: Toot sweet—toot sweet—toot God-damn sweet—jambon? Des œufs! Fromages! Vin! Vin! GOWDY: Bière, bière, bière!

[Flagg enters. The three jump up and push back their chairs. When he yells "Clear out," the tumult instantly ceases. Flagg is cold sober, still in his old clothes and dusty, but recently shaven, and possessed of rolled leggings and an old brown shirt]

FLAGG: Clear out, you yapping hounds, and tell the new platoon commander to billet every man down the moment he finishes mess. Tell him I don't want to see one of 'em around this tavern till that's done. [Turns; crosses to bar] Tell them not to rag a man to-night. [Takes bottle; turns to them] As soon as they know their billets, let 'em out. Let 'em drink. Let 'em fight. Get out.

THE RUNNERS: [Gently; somewhat discouraged] Ay, ay, sir.

[They disappear. Charmaine enters quietly and stands leaning in the doorway. Flagg pours a beaker and drinks it pleasantly, enjoyingly. Then he pours a second and walks around to chair at table and sits down. Charmaine has watched this from the doorway. He sees her at last]

FLAGG: [Arising and bowing grandiosely, holding aloft the drink] Madame la comtesse de la Cognac!

CHARMAINE: [Embarrassed] Le grand capitaine de ma cœur.

FLAGG: Yes, I'm the captain of your heart! Like hell I am. Why don't you come and kiss me? None but the brave, you know . . .

CHARMAINE: Je ne comprends pas.

FLAGG: Oh, no. You don't understand me. Well, I'm a weary man, and I don't want any finagling from you.

CHARMAINE: [At door] You want me to kiss you? FLAGG: Sure I want you to kiss me. Even though you played the dirtiest sort of trick on me. [The liquor is beginning to deaden him] A dirty trick on your poor old Captain Flagg. [Turns to her] If I weren't so kind and gentle I'd go out in the orchard, cut a cherry switch, and give you a tanning.

[She crosses over, kisses him quickly, and draws back, a charmed bird before a snake] CHARMAINE: You're a terrible man, monsieur.

FLAGG: I ain't terrible to you, honey. Come sit by your old man. [She sits on the table and looks down into his eyes] Ain't I tired? Jeez, but I'm off war for life. It's all right with thirty or forty men in the hills who know their business. But there's so many little boys along with me ain't got any business here at all. [He sighs and drinks the rest of the brandy] Ah! There ain't no strength in this stuff any more. [Hands her his glass, which she places on table. He gets up unsteadily] Le's go walk by the canal. I wanna get away from these new lieutenants. Le's walk along that bicycle path.

CHARMAINE: Non, non, non. Demain soir. Demain soir.

FLAGG: To-morrow? All right. I'm tired anyhow. Never been so tired before. Liquor just takes the pins out of my knees. Gimme a bottle to drink in bed. I don't want to think to-night.

CHARMAINE: [Bringing him a bottle from the bar, smiling] Ah, monsieur, vous êtes un grand soldat. FLAGG: [Wandering to the door, suddenly apathetic] Nighty, sweetie. See you tomorrow.

[He goes out at rear]

QUIRT: [Entering stealthily, in a farmer's smock which comes to his waist] So he's gone away. . . . What's the matter with the old boy?

[He attempts to kiss her. She shudders]

CHARMAINE: [Drawing away from him] Non, non, non! Merci.

QUIRT: Why, what's the matter, Pittsburgh? Don't you love me no more?

CHARMAINE: Oui-mais-

QUIRT: Of course I understand. Seeing him that way sort of cut you up, especially when I was wearing such a lousy outfit, you liking them all in uniforms. Just wait, baby. When I git that brass lock off Fergie's box and turn out in his blues on sick leave, you'll forget this Flagg person. I understand. Sure. I been with soldiers' girls a lot, myself.

CHARMAINE: When you are beautiful, mon sergeant, then I love you—

[She runs up steps]
QUIRT: Come back here!

[She disappears, laughing. Kiper and Lipinsky enter]

KIPER: Jeez, Sergeant, but you picked a funny outfit to be buried in.

QUIRT: [At foot of stairs—hostile] Who's thinking of burying me?

KIPER: I expect Flagg'll make me bury you. But he's going to lay you out himself.

QUIRT: Is he looking for me? How did he know I'm here.

LIPINSKY: We just heard Ferguson telling him. I ain't never heard him swear so much since I been with him. We came to ask you to run away some more.

QUIRT: You did, eh? Well, you can go down to the bridge and head him off. You can tell him he passed up visiting this place just before the outfit shoved last time. You can tell him if he comes up here I'll cut his gizzard out for him. You can tell him I'm engaged to be married, and I ain't got no duty for him around here.

[Flagg enters, drunk and swaggering]

FLAGG: Who's the hay-shaker? Well, if it ain't Sergeant Quirt! A regular family reunion. Quirt, how are you? When you coming back to the factory?

QUIRT: Flagg, you're out of this here detail. You're hands off my business after that dirty trick you put over on me. If I kill you there isn't a court can touch me for it in this man's army.

FLAGG: Quirt, you're drunk.

QUIRT: Both of us.

FLAGG: Yeah, both of us.

QUIRT: Well, then, Flagg, you're drunk. What are you going to do about it?

FLAGG: I'm gonna have a drink.

[Turns to bar and takes bottle; pours two drinks]

OUIRT: Both of us.

FLAGG: Yeah, both of us. [They drink, first bowing to each other] Quirt, I got something I want to tell you.

QUIRT: The hell!

FLAGG: You want to hear it? OUIRT: I ain't particular.

FLAGG: Well, this is it, Sergeant. You can go jump in the canal. I knew you'd head for Charmaine as soon as you got that bullet under your hide. You had half a day's start of me and you didn't beat me more than five minutes. You might just as well 'a' stayed on the bakery route. You ain't no more needed here than a third leg on a kangaroo. Have one on me.

[Flagg pours for both]

QUIRT: [They bow] Delighted, I'm sure. [They drink and replace glasses] You're a hell of an officer, Flagg [Quirt wipes right hand on smock], and your views on me probably ain't worth a damn. On the other hand, it's only fair to warn you that I'm the sole survivor of seven catastrophes, any one of which was calculated to carry off every man-jack in the immediate neighborhood as was adjacent, and if there was to be a catastrophe of any dimensions in this here vicinity in the near future, I have expectations of survival exceeding your own. Have one on me.

[Quirt pours drinks]

FLAGG: Thank you, Quirt, I will. [They drink, and Flagg drunkenly points finger at Quirt until he can get his mind to working] Your method of expressing yourself, Quirt, is complicated by your tongue being as thick as your God-damn head. But if you mean trouble, let me point out to you that among other things, you forgot to bring your gun along. [Quirt feels for his absent weapon; Flagg laughs heartily] Ain't you a neat little fool, Hoppergrass, and will you drink?

QUIRT: I will.

[Flagg pours. Both bow, then drink again; but Quirt has taken a sip before he realizes he hasn't bowed]

FLAGG: Do you give up?

QUIRT: No.

FLAGG: [Turns to bar and starts pouring] Have another.

KIPER: [Holding Quirt] What do you want done with him. sir?

FLAGG: [To Lipinsky, who is holding him] Let me go or I'll knock you for a row of G.I. cans. Take the gun away from him. [Quirt throws the automatic on the floor. Flagg puts his foot on it] Let go, all. [Quirt is turned loose] Well, bo, had enough?

QUIRT: I'll tell you what I'll do with you. I'll go outside with you and try two of them little toys at fifty yards.

FLAGG: And you, the best pistol shot in the corps, would put one through my carburetor as easy as pitching a penny in a well. Come again.

QUIRT: I'll take you on any way you can think of, you baboon. I can out-shoot you and out-think you and out-drink you. There ain't nothing I can't do better than you.

FLAGG: You're a liar, Quirt, and you know it. I could break you in two. You got my gun because you jumped me without warning. No soldier you ever soldiered with could head me when I got started . . . and by the way, Quirt, if you can outdrink me you ain't leading out very well to-night. You're talking thick and wild, Quirt, thick and wild. You'd better turn in somewhere and sleep it

QUIRT: Me? Sleep off a couple of drinks? I was living on cognac when all your buttons was safety

FLAGG: Yeah, well, you can't carry it the way you used to, then. You're getting old, Quirt. Old and feeble. Yeah, you're getting old.

QUIRT: Not me, You may be an old man, Flagg. Or an old woman if it suits you better, but not me. Captains and generals, they pass along. I've seen hundreds of 'em. Better men than you, Flagg. They passed along. But top sergeants is eternal. They don't never die.

FLAGG: Well, if you don't want to die, you top sergeant, don't fool with me. I've seen top sergeants go damn fast-Now, listen, Quirt, are you going to jump in that canal or are you going to need six pall-bearers to take you there?

QUIRT: It'll take more than six pall-bearers to put me in one of these French canals. I don't like the taste of them.

[Charmaine re-enters]

FLAGG: Charmaine! Cognac!

[Charmaine crosses behind table; gets bottle; pours drink for Quirt, also for Flagg]

CHARMAINE: [Laying a hand on the Captain's vioulder] Is it now-friends again?

FLAGG: [Putting an arm about her] Best you ever saw, Charmaine. We'll drink to it, Quirt. Flagg and Quirt forever—till you get bumped off. Flagg and Quirt, the tropical twins! There ain't room for both of 'em in the whole world!

[Flagg pats Charmaine on hip]

QUIRT: [Sets down his glass, hard] Damn you, Flagg!

FLAGG: [Setting down his glass] What's the matter, Hoppergrass? Aren't you drinking?

QUIRT: I got here first, Flagg.

FLAGO: I know it. Nobody said you didn't.

QUIRT: [Rising] You take your hands off Char-

FLAGG: Any time you want my hands off Charmaine, you come and take 'em off.

CHARMAINE: No. No! You must be friends.

FLAGG: With you around!

QUIRT: It strikes me there's only room for one of us in this shanty to-night. Do you plan on going somewhere, or not?

FLAGG: Did you ever see me leaving any place I didn't feel like leaving?

CHARMAINE: [Touching the Captain's sleeve] Don't fight-please.

FLAGG: [Not looking at her—pushing her back] The hell you say! First time in six months I've had a good reason for fighting. The Germans don't want my woman. I been fighting them for eight dollars a day. . . . Go on back of the counter. CHARMAINE: I—I love you both.

QUIRT: You get to hell outta here, Flagg. Dig up a broad of your own.

FLAGG: Sorry. Rejected.

QUIRT: You ain't man enough to shoot me for her. Well, here's what I'll do. I'll shoot you dice for her. [Tosses out dice on table] High dice, aces low. [Kiper and Lipinsky take steps forward, interested]

FLAGG: Boys, is Quirt crooked with the bones?

[Lipinsky goes back to lean on platform] KIPER: He's got a pair out to be in a circus.

[Quirt gives Kiper a bad look]

FLAGG: Then we'll deal a hand at blackjack.

OUIRT: [Picks up dice; puts them back in pocket, while Kiper goes back with Lipinsky] And the guy that loses beats it for somewhere else.

FLAGG: What do you mean, beats it? We'll shoot, but my way. The man that wins gets a gun, and the man that loses gets a head start. Everybody wins, see? One gets the girl and the other gets a chance to stay in bed the rest of this war.

KIPER: Captain Flagg, I don't think you ought to FLAGG: Close your hatch. I'll try anything once, soldier. [Briskly] Now for a game of blackjack for one automatic.

QUIRT: That's all right with me.

FLAGG: And the gun on the table between us.

[He picks it up]

KIPER: [As he and Lipinsky seize Quirt's arms] Come quiet now, before he notices.

QUIRT: [Writhing loose] Keep off me, you swine! [Kiper and Lipinsky fall back]

FLAGG: [Having recovered gun, starts to straighten up] March out that door, both of you, and if you stick a neck in here before the game's over, I promise to wreck you for life. Are you going, or do I demonstrate? [They go out quickly] Charmaine! Upstairs!

[She goes. Flagg sits at table; Quirt on table. Flagg shuffles cards, and offering them to Quirt, says "Cut." Quirt fondles cards; says "Be good to me, babies, and I'll let moonlight into a captain." He cuts. Flagg deals one to Quirt, then one to himself; then one to Quirt, and looks at the next one for himself!

QUIRT: What's that, a king?

FLAGG: How many you want? Make it snappy and knock off that guff. Here's looking down your grave. May you have many worms, Quirt.

QUIRT: Crawling, right out of your teeth, Flagg. Hit me.

FLAGG: [Deals a card face up] A two-spot. Well, any more?

QUIRT: Hit me again.

FLAGG: [Dealing one] Well, you got a king that time. Remember, if you hold six cards without going bust you can empty the automatic at me.

QUIRT: Hit me again.

FLAGG: A king, by God! [Quirt, with one sweep turns over the table, with candles and chairs, and dives through the door; runs off] You double-dealing Chinaman! [Flagg finds the gun in the darkness and fires shot just outside the door. He is heard reentering] Show a light, somebody, Charmaine!

[Flagg sets up the table]

CHARMAINE: [At the head of the stairs with a lamp] What is it? You have killed him?

[Goes up to door]

FLAGG: Killed hell! He knocked out the light and ran, the dirty hound! [Charmaine looks out the door, shielding the lamp from the wind] Oh, he's gone. CHARMAINE: Maybe you hit him.

[Puts lamp on table; then crosses to Flagg]

FLAGG: Don't you worry. He was halfway to the river, the rate he was going, before I found the door. Don't you weep, sweetheart [Puts her on his left knee]; you're weeping for a skunk that'd run out on a game of cards. It's you and me to-night, lady. Listen, Charmaine [Putting his arm around her]; I love you like the devil. I always did. You love me, Charmaine?

CHARMAINE: Only you.

FLAGG: God, I'm dead—I'm going to sleep for three days.

[Flagg rests head on her breast and sighs. Then Lipinsky and Gowdy walk in]

LIPINSKY: Sorry to disturb you, sir.

FLAGG: My God, did you hear what I told you?

LIPINSKY: Got bad news, Captain Flagg.

FLAGG: Spit it out.

LIPINSKY: The outfit's going back. Battalion moving at once.

FLAGG: What? What?

LIPINSKY: We're ordered back. Ordered back in. Everybody's going back in. General movement.

FLAGG: Dammit, I'm on leave.

GOWDY: All leaves revoked, Captain Flagg.

FLAGG: Well, why couldn't you stay away from here? You knew where I was. Why in hell did you have to come and tell me?

gowdy: Well, headquarters sent out, looking for you.

LIPINSKY: Kiper wouldn't come, Captain Flagg. He was for leaving you alone.

FLAGG: He was, was he? Well, Kiper's got sense. Look here, you never found me to give me the message, and I'm not going. Can you remember, or have I got to bury you to keep your mouth shut? What right have they got to offer a man leave and then revoke it? I gave them their prisoner! I've got their damn papers!

LIPINSKY: Well, you see, the company's going to shove off. What could we do?

FLAGG: You could have an attack of something, damn it to hell! You could fall and break your neck on the way here.

LIPINSKY: I was afraid not to let you know. You always wanted to know.

FLAGG: Well, you've got to do some tall lying to make up for it, because I'm not going. Tell them any story you think of, only I never got the news. I earned my leave, and it's signed, sealed, and delivered. That crowd at headquarters has got to live up to its end of the bargain. They can't take these men back in. I won't stand for it. [Turns to Charmaine] Shall we stay here, Charmaine?

CHARMAINE: Oui, ici.

[They embrace. Flagg rests head on her breast] FLAGG: [After a pause, shakes himself a bit] No, I'll go. I may be drunk, but I know I'll go. There's something rotten about this profession of arms, some kind of damned religion connected with it that you can't shake. When they tell you to die, you have to do it, even if you're a better man than they are. Good-bye, Charmaine, put your money in real estate, and marry that cuckoo if you can. You'll never see me again. This town is a jinx for me. [Again rests head on Charmaine] God Almighty, but I'm tired. [He rises and crosses to where Ferguson has entered. Charmaine sits in chair watching] Hello, Fergy. We're shoving off. Follow us, because we don't know where we're going. Nobody knows.

[He goes out, staggering, tired. Ferguson follows him out. Gowdy and Lipinsky follow Ferguson. Charmaine buries her head in arms on table]

QUIRT: [Comes in upper floor stairway] Hello, Pittsburgh!

CHARMAINE: You are not killed?

QUIRT: [Coming downstairs to bottom step] No. It's me all right. Everybody gone?

CHARMAINE: Everybody.

QUIRT: Outfit's going in again, huh?

CHARMAINE: Oui.

QUIRT: Well, well! I been upstairs. Climbed up the kitchen roof. Do you love your papa?

CHARMAINE: Mais oui.

QUIRT: Then you better kiss him good-bye. [Pats her face; then kisses her. Staggers up to door] What a lot of God-damn fools it takes to make a war! Hey, Flagg, wait for baby!

[Charmaine watches from the table]

CURTAIN

Maxwell Anderson

(1888----)

After Eugene O'Neill, no one envisioned higher standards for the American theatre than Maxwell Anderson. Although quite at home in prose, he set up precepts for verse drama; and although adept at writing salty humor, he decided that nothing less than the composition of poetic tragedy could be a proper aim for American dramatists. Whether his approach to poetic drama was not somewhat more academic than necessary, and whether he did not often say less than he seemed to be saying in his purple patches—these and other matters concerning his playwriting could be widely debated. But it was surely an accomplishment for Maxwell Anderson to be the only American (except for the Americanborn naturalized Englishman T. S. Eliot) to make the Broadway playgoer accept verse drama, and this not merely once but on some half-dozen occasions between 1930 and 1950.

Anderson was the son of a Baptist preacher who occupied various pastorates in Pennsylvania and the Middle West. Having developed a love of literature at an early age. Anderson took a Bachelor of Arts degree at the University of North Dakota and a Master of Arts at Stanford University and in 1914 began to teach English. Soon, however, his ideals began to exercise a disturbing influence on his career. He was dismissed from a post at Whittier College, in California, for advocating pacifism during the First World War, and then found himself in difficulties in the field of journalism, to which he had turned for a living. He lost his job on the San Francisco Bulletin in 1918 for his unorthodox editorials and was discharged from other positions quickly and with fateful regularity. He found a refuge at last on Pulitzer's liberal morning newspaper, the New York World, then the haven of many men who later achieved literary distinction. When he left the World. in 1924, it was not as an unwanted editorial writer but as coauthor of one of the most successful plays of his time, What Price Glory?

Anderson's first victories in the field of playwriting were in the service of prose realism. After collaborating with Laurence Stallings on What Price Glory?, he adapted Jim Tully's novel about hobos, Beggars of Life, under the title Outside Looking In (1925); he then wrote a highly successful comedy of marriage, Saturday's Children (1927), in which economics destroys domestic happiness; and he collaborated with the journalist Harold Hickerson on a treatment of the Sacco-Vanzetti case, Gods of the Lightning (1928), which crackled with indignation at evidences of social injustice. Later, in 1933, he produced a stinging satire on Congressional logrolling, Both Your Houses, which won a Pulitzer Prize, and he continued to write plays in prose whenever he felt that prose dialogue suited his theme. But he had had romantic and poetic aspirations from the very start of his career. He wrote a youthful volume of lyrics, You Who Have Dreams, and his very first play to be produced, White Desert (1923), was a poetic tragedy. It failed, and he bided his time until 1930 before venturing into poetry again.

When Anderson wrote Elizabeth the Queen, he was already an experienced playwright and showman. He reflected that successful verse drama had never been written about contemporary life and decided upon a historical subject: the fatal love affair of Elizabeth and Lord Essex. Superbly produced by the Theatre Guild, with Lynn Fontanne playing Elizabeth and Alfred Lunt as Essex, this tragedy proved highly successful. It was, in fact, the first successful drama of the modern American theatre to be written in verse. Encouraged by his success, Anderson wrote a number of other historical plays. the best being Mary of Scotland (1933) and Anne of the Thousand Days (1948). The three plays form a Tudor trilogy, although they were not written in chronological order. Anderson turned to American history in Night over Taos (1932) and Valley Forge (1934), to Austrian history in The Masque of Kings (1937), and to the Middle Ages in Joan of Lorraine (1946).

In these and other histories, Anderson was more than a chronicler of romantic events. He employed the past to illuminate the present in his story of Joan of Arc, in an effort to dramatize the problem of heroism. He used the story of the ill-starred Rudolph of Hapsburg, in The Masque of Kings, to ask whether a true idealist could align himself with any revolutionary movement: that is, whether one was not apt to overthrow a tyrannical government only to become saddled with a new and possibly worse tyranny. Anderson's libretto for the Kurt Weill musical comedy Knickerbocker Holiday (1938) revived early New York history with a view to denouncing authoritarian tendencies in American life; the play was even prefaced with an attack on the New Deal. And in the Tudor romances, Anderson never veered far from his customary suspicions of government as a magnet for power lust.

But Anderson did not confine himself to historical drama. In Winterset (1935), he returned to the Sacco-Vanzetti case and wrote a contemporary poetic tragedy filled with indignation and pity. He satirized the modern materialistic world in the poetic fantasy High Tor (1937). And he turned to the question of fascism in Key Largo (1938), dramatizing his conviction that one could not evade the challenge of the times. Anderson's chief interest, however, lay not in asserting political beliefs so much as in demonstrating his tragic view of life. He saw man as a creature of high passion, who is raised to tragic stature by the intensity of his nature. Anderson created characters whose wills clash mightily and send sparks into the night of human error and evil. It is the wonder of man's spiritual resources that has fascinated him most, and his ultimate objective has always been the writing of universal drama. Even in dealing with such topical matters as the Second World War-in Candle in the Wind (1941) and The Eve of St. Mark (1942)—or the problem of racial prejudice—in Lost in the Stars (1949), his dramatization of the novel Cry, the Beloved Country —he tried to universalize the immediate issues. In fact, he conscientiously differentiated between universal and topical plays, writing the latter in prose. He came to be most at home in the romantic past and in the drama of "universals" and was least successful when he was most journalistic.

An estimate of Anderson's work as a poetic dramatist cannot be made without examining each of the plays in some detail. It can be said, however, that he became to the American theatre what Schiller was to the German and Rostand to the French. If he was by no means so true a poet as Schiller or so fine an ironist as Rostand, he too gave the stage a romantic drama high in spirit and vaguely idealistic in aim. In High Tor he wrote the best romantic comedy and fantasy of the American theatre. In Winterset he came closer than any other American playwright to writing a poetic tragedy in verse about modern life. Although he did not quite create an integrated and completely satisfying play in Winterset, the second act of this tragedy, in which the quest for justice flares into passionate drama, is one of the memorable pieces of modern playwriting. And the Tudor plays are filled with spirited writing and with rousing conflict. Even the derivativeness of much of his verse in these plays was no great impediment to effectiveness except when he became too prolix; and the questionable profundity of his statement here, as in other plays, was no serious hindrance to dramatic exaltation. A good deal of vigor and vivacity, as well as elevation, came into our theatre when Anderson began reacquainting us with Elizabethan heroes and scoundrels. The question uppermost in the minds of his severest critics was simply whether Anderson was on the right track in trying to make the drama literary in conventional terms, and this is a question that apparently troubled the author himself from time to time. But every writer works within the limits of his endowment. and Anderson's was rich if not remarkably original.

Elizabeth the Queen is unquestionably the cornerstone of Anderson's achievement in verse drama. This play holds in solution the points of view that ruled most of his later work-namely, his distrust of government and of power politics, his conviction that men of good will are apt to be destroyed while "the rats inherit the earth," and his belief that the pageant of human desire and suffering is nevertheless awe-inspiring and magnificent. Elizabeth the Queen fulfills the Aristotelian principles which Anderson accepted as right and necessary. The tragedy revolves around strong personalities who are fired by high passion and who dignify the human spirit in the very act of destroying themselves through their failings; they are, in other words, heroic characters destroyed by a "tragic flaw" but capable of asserting the splendor of the soul even in error and defeat.

Anderson believed that the audience of the theatre. which he celebrated as the "phoenix of the arts," wants to be convinced "that men have a desire to break the molds of earth which encase them." This could be accomplished by "the spiritual awakening. or regeneration" of the hero, and Anderson gave much thought to the nature of tragic art in the prefaces he wrote to several of his plays. These prefaces, collected in a volume entitled Off Broadway (1947), contain a good deal of considered, if also somewhat "inspirational," writing. But all his thoughts led him to one unavoidable conclusion: high matter required a heightened style of writing, and the American drama needed "the touch of a great poet." Without ever claiming to be that poet, Anderson decided that he had to write his tragedies in verse. Elizabeth the Queen represents his first mature attempt to develop a workmanlike poetic style. The over-all pattern is Elizabethan blank verse, although a good deal of the writing is more Tennysonian than Elizabethan in quality. The metrical form does not, however, impose any restraints upon the dramatic flow of the dialogue, and Anderson takes as many liberties with the blank-verse line as he feels it necessary or expedient to take in the modern theatre. The general effect of the writing is one of passionateness and elevated expression.

An entrance hall before a council chamber in the palace at Whitehall. The entrance to the council room is closed and four Guards with halberds stand at either side. A small door at the left of the entrance is also shut. It is early morning. The Guards stand immobile.

ACT I. SCENE I.

FIRST GUARD: The sun's out again, and it's guineas to pounds the earl comes back this morning.

SECOND GUARD: I'll be glad of it, for one. You get nothing but black looks about the court when he's away.

FIRST GUARD: You'll get little else now he's back, my bully. They quarreled too far for mending, this time.

THIRD GUARD: Tut! They quarrel no more than the cock with the hen. The earl's been sick.

FIRST GUARD: Sick of the queen's displeasure. It's a disease a favorite can die of, and many have.

FOURTH GUARD: He's no sicker of her displeasure than she of his, if a man may judge. Once the earl's gone there's no dancing, no plays, no feasting . . . nothing to do nights but sleep. The very scullery-maids grow cold, and go to bed alone—like the queen.

FIRST GUARD: There are some even a scullery-maid would seldom kiss, save in moments of great excitement. Poor Wat looks forward to feast nights.

FOURTH GUARD: I've had my luck.

FIRST GUARD: You've had what was coming to you. Mucklemouth Jean, of the back kitchen.

FOURTH GUARD: You'd have been glad of her yourself if you could have had her.

FIRST GUARD: Consider, man. She may not have been true. When she wouldn't play with you, mayhap she was playing with somebody else. And if the queen could live without her Earl of Essex, it may have been because Sir Walter had a new suit of silver armor.

THIRD GUARD: And there's a handsome man.

FOURTH GUARD: God defend me from speaking lightly of the queen!

FIRST GUARD: Eh? God defend you? Let no man accuse me of speaking lightly of the queen, nor of any other woman . . . unless she be a light woman, in which case, God defend me, I will speak lightly of her if I choose.

THIRD GUARD: What say you of the queen?

FIRST GUARD: Of the queen? I say she is well-known to be the virgin queen; I say no more.

SECOND GUARD: But do you think she is a virgin? FIRST GUARD: She has doubtless been a virgin, bully, for all women have been virgins, but the question is: First, when . . . and, second, where?

SECOND GUARD: Where?

FIRST GUARD: Where, bully, where?

THIRD GUARD: Would you not say, in the proper place?

FIRST GUARD: No. I would not say in the proper place. Because it is hard to say if there is a proper place wherein to be a virgin . . . unless it be in church, and, God defend me, I do not go to church.

SECOND GUARD: You do not go to church?

FIRST GUARD: No, for my sins, I do not go to church . . . or, if you like, I do not go to church

SECOND GUARD: Does it follow that the church is a proper place for virgins?

FIRST GUARD: It does. Did I not tell you I do not go there for my sins?

FOURTH GUARD: They say the queen's getting to be an old woman; but I swear she looks younger than my wife, whom I married a young thing, six years come Easter.

THIRD GUARD: It would age a girl fast, just the look of you.

FIRST GUARD: As for the queen, powder and paint for my sins.

account for some of it. To say nothing of the earl. A young lover will do much for a lady's face.

FOURTH GUARD: Now God defend me . . .

FIRST GUARD: Aye, aye . . . God defend poor Wat.

[A Nobleman enters in silver armor. It is Sir Walter Raleigh, no other]

RALEIGH: Has the queen come forth yet?

FIRST GUARD: No, Sir Walter.

RALEIGH: The Earl of Essex . . . is he here?

FIRST GUARD: No, my lord.

RALEIGH: When he comes send me word. I shall be in the north corridor. [He turns]

FIRST GUARD: Good, my lord.

[Penelope Gray comes in from the right, passing through]

RALEIGH: [Meeting her] Greetings, lady, from my heart.

PENELOPE: Good-morrow, lord, from my soul.

RALEIGH: I take my oath in your face that you are rushing to the window to witness the arrival of my lord of Essex.

PENELOPE: And in your teeth I swear I am on no such errand . . . but only to see the sunrise.

RALEIGH: The sun has been up this hour, my dear. PENELOPE: The more reason to hurry, gracious knight.

RALEIGH: Do you think to pull the bag over my head so easily, Penelope? On a day when the earl returns every petticoat in the palace is hung with an eye to pleasing him. Yours not the least.

PENELOPE: I deny him thrice.

RALEIGH: I relinquish you, lady. Run, run to the window! He will be here and you will miss him!

PENELOPE: Is there a lady would run from Sir Walter in his silver suiting? Since the sun is up . . . I have no errand.

RALEIGH: Is there no limit to a woman's deception, wench? Would you go so far as to appear pleased if I kissed you?

PENELOPE: And no deception. [He kisses her] I call the Gods to witness . . . did I not blush prettily?

RALEIGH: And meant it not at all. Tell me, did the queen send you to look out the casement for news of her Essex, or did you come at the prompting of your heart?

PENELOPE: Shall I tell you the truth?

RALEIGH: Verily.

PENELOPE: The truth is I cannot answer.

RALEIGH: Both, then?

PENELOPE: Both or one or neither.

RALEIGH: Fie on the baggage.

PENELOPE: Is it not a virtue to be close-mouthed in the queen's service?

RALEIGH: If you kept the rest of your person as close as your mouth what a paragon of virtue you would be!

PENELOPE: Indeed, my lord, I am.

RALEIGH: Indeed, my lady? Have there not been certain deeds on dark nights?

PENELOPE: Sh! Under the rose.

RALEIGH: Meaning under covers . . .

PENELOPE: Fie on my lord, to make me out a strumpet!

RALEIGH: It is my manner of wooing, fair maid! I woo by suggestion of images . . .

PENELOPE: Like small boys on the closet wall . . .

RALEIGH: Like a soldier . . .

PENELOPE: Aye, a veteran . . . of encounters . . . RALEIGH: I will have you yet, my love; I will take lessons from this earl . . .

PENELOPE: Take this lesson from me, my lord: You must learn to desire what you would have. Much wanting makes many a maid a wanton. You want me not . . . nor I you. You wear your silver for a queen.

CAPTAIN: Good-morrow, Sir Walter. Is the queen still under canopy?

RALEIGH: I know not.

CAPTAIN: The earl is here and would see her.

RALEIGH: Bid him hurry if he wishes to find her abed as usual.

PENELOPE: She is dressed and stirring, captain, and awaits my lord.

RALEIGH: And many another fair maid awaits him likewise, captain. Take him that message from me. Run, girl, run. Tell the queen.

PENELOPE: [Going] You make yourself so easily disliked.

[She goes right. Cecil enters, passing her]

CECIL: He is here?

RALEIGH: So. The heavenly boy, clad in the regalia of the sun, even now extracts his gallant foot from his golden stirrup and makes shift to descend from his heaving charger. Acclamation lifts in every voice, tears well to every eye... with the exception of mine, perhaps, and yours, I hope...

CECIL: I am at a pass to welcome him, myself. This Elizabeth of ours can be difficult on her good days... and there have been no good ones lately.

[Two Men-at-Arms enter with silver armor in their arms]

RALEIGH: And what is all this, sirrah?

FIRST MAN: Armor, my lord.

RALEIGH: For whom?

FIRST MAN: We know not.

RALEIGH: Now by the ten thousand holy names! Am I mistaken, Robert, or is this armor much like my own?

CECIL: Very like, I should say. Is it sterling?

RALEIGH: And the self-same pattern. Has the earl gone lunatic?

CECIL: He means to outshine you, perhaps.

RALEIGH: Has it come to this? Do I set the style for Essex?

That would be a mad trick, to dress himself like me!

[Bacon appears in the doorway at right] What do you know of this, Sir Francis?

BACON: Greeks, my lord, bearing gifts.

RALEIGH: To hell with your Greeks! The devil damn him!

This is some blackguardry!

[Two more Men-at-Arms enter, carrying armor] There's more of it! Good God, it comes in bales! I say, who's to wear this, sirrah? Who is it for?

[Essex enters from corridor between the two files of soldiers, pushing them aside as he does so, and crosses to right of Raleigh, speaking as he enters]

ESSEX: Their name is legion, Sir Walter. Happily met!

Felicitations on your effulgence, sir!

You're more splendid than I had imagined. News came of your silver

Even in my retreat! I was ill, and I swear it cured me!

You should have heard the compliments I've heard Passed on you! Sir Walter's in silver! The world's outdone.

They said—the moon out-mooned. He gleams down every corridor

And every head's turned after him. The queen Herself has admired it—the design—the workman-ship!

There's nothing like it this side of Heaven's streets.

And I said to myself—the great man—this is what we have needed——

More silver everywhere—oceans of silver!
Sir Walter has set the style, the world will follow.
So I sent for the silver-smiths, and by their sweat
Here's for you lads, tailored to every man's meas-

Shall Raleigh wear silver alone? Why, no,

The whole court shall go argent!

RALEIGH: Take care, my lord.

I bear insults badly.

ESSEX: And where are you insulted?

For the queen's service you buy you a silver armor. In the queen's service I buy you a dozen more.

A gift, my friends, each man to own his own,

As you own yours. What insult?

RALEIGH: Have your laugh,

Let the queen and court laugh with you! Since you are envious

You may have my suit. I had not thought even Essex

Bore so petty a mind.

ESSEX: I misunderstood you

Perhaps, Sir Walter. I had supposed you donned Silver for our queen, but I was mistaken . . .

Keep these all for yourself. The men shall have others . . .

Some duller color.

RALEIGH: I have borne much from you Out of regard for the queen, my lord of Essex.

ESSEX: And I from you.

By God . . .

CECIL: You have forgotten, Sir Walter,

A certain appointment . . .

RALEIGH: And you will bear more, by Heaven! ...

CECIL: He is going to the queen,

Remember. And we have an errand.

ESSEX: You presume to protect me,

Master Secretary?

CECIL: I protect you both, and our mistress.

There can be no quarreling here.

RALEIGH: That's very true. Let us go. [Cecil and Raleigh go out right]

BACON: And this armor? What becomes of it?

ESSEX: I have given it.

Would you have me take it back?

BACON: There has seldom been

A man so little wise, so headstrong, but he Could sometimes see how necessary it is

To keep friends and not make enemies at court.

But you . . . God knows.

essex: Let him make friends with me.

He may need friends himself.

[To the Guards] These are your armors.

Keep them, wear them, sell them, whatever you like . . .

Or your captain directs you.

FIRST GUARD: We thank you.

[They retire to examine the armor]

BACON: You are going to the queen?

ESSEX: Yes. God help us both!

BACON: Then hear me a moment. . . .

ESSEX: Speak, schoolmaster,

I knew it was coming. You've been quiet too long.

BACON: Listen to me this once, and listen this once

To purpose, my lord, or it may hardly be worth

My while ever to give you advice again

Or for you to take it. You have enough on your hands

Without quarrelling with Raleigh. You have quarrelled with the queen

Against my judgment. . . .

essex: God and the devil! Can a man

Quarrel on order or avoid a quarrel at will?

BACON: Why certainly, if he knows his way.

essex: Not I.

BACON: You quarrelled with her, because she wished to keep peace.

And you wanted war. . . .

ESSEX: We are at war with Spain!

Rut such a silly frightened womaniel

But such a silly, frightened, womanish war As only a woman would fight. . . .

BACON: She is a woman and fights a womanish war;

But ask yourself one question and answer it Honestly, dear Essex, and perhaps you will see then Why I speak sharply. You are my friend and patron. Where you gain I gain . . . where you lose I lose . . . And I see you riding straight to a fall today . . . And I'd rather your neck weren't broken.

essex: Ask myself

What question?

BACON: Ask yourself what you want:
To retain the favor of the queen, remain
Her favorite, keep all that goes with this;
Or set yourself against her and trust your fortune
To popular favor?

ESSEX: I'll not answer that.

BACON: Then . . . I have done.

ESSEX: Forgive me, dear friend, forgive me, I have been ill, and this silly jackanapes

Of a Paleigh appears me with his silver mounting.

Of a Raleigh angers me with his silver mountings Till I forget who's my friend. You know my answer In regard to the queen. I must keep her favor. Only it makes me mad to see all this . . .

This utter mismanagement, when a man's hand and brain

Are needed and cannot be used.

BACON: Let me answer for you;

You are not forthright with yourself. The queen Fights wars with tergiversation and ambiguities... You wish to complete your record as general, Crush Spain, subdue Ireland, make a name like Cæsar's, Climb to the pinnacle of fame. Take care. You are too popular already. You have Won at Cadiz, caught the people's hearts, Caught their voices till the streets ring your name Whenever you pass. You are loved better than The queen. That is your danger. She will not suffer A subject to eclipse her; she cannot suffer it. Make no mistake. She will not.

essex: And I must wait,

Bite my nails in a corner, let her lose to Spain, Keep myself back for policy?

BACON: Even so.

ESSEX: I come of better blood than Elizabeth. My name was among the earls around King John Under the oak. What the nobles have taught a king A noble may teach a queen.

BACON: You talk treason and death.

The old order is dead, and you and your house will die

With it if you cannot learn.

ESSEX: So said King John

Under the oak, or wherever he was standing, And little he got by it, as you may recall.

What the devil's a king but a man, or a queen but a woman?

BACON: King John is dead; this is Elizabeth, Queen in her own right, daughter of a haughty line. There is one man in all her kingdom she fears And that man's yourself, and she has good reason to fear you.

You're a man not easily governed, a natural rebel, Moreover, a general, popular and acclaimed, And, last, she loves you, which makes you the more to be feared,

Whether you love her or not. ESSEX: I do love her! I do!

BACON: You play dangerously there, my lord.

ESSEX: I've never yet loved or hated

For policy nor a purpose. I tell you she's a witch——And has a witch's brain. I love her, I fear her, I hate her, I adore her——

BACON: That side of it you must know

For yourself.

ESSEX: I will walk softly—here is my hand. Distress yourself no more—I can carry myself.

BACON: Only count not too much on the loves of queens.

essex: I'll remember.

[Cecil and Raleigh reappear in the doorway at the right. Raleigh is wearing ordinary armor and carries his silver suit. Essex looks at him, biting his lip]

Sir Walter, take care of your health!

RALEIGH: My health, sir?

ESSEX: [Going out] Wearing no silver, in this chilly weather.

RALEIGH: [Tossing his silver armor into the pile] Put that with the others.

FIRST GUARD: Are we to wear them, sir?

RALEIGH: No. Melt them down and sell the silver. And thus see for yourself how soon a fool is parted from his money. Take station in the outer hall and carry this trash with you.

first guard: Yes, sir.

[The Guards go out right]

RALEIGH: [To Bacon] And you, sir, you are his friend. . . .

BACON: And yours, Sir Walter. . . .

RALEIGH: It's the first I've heard of it, but if you're mine too, so much the better. Carry this news to him: his suits go to the melting-pot.

BACON: Willingly, my lord, if I see him. You have done quite properly.

RALEIGH: I do not ask your commendation! BACON: No, but you have it.

[He bows low and goes out to left]

RALEIGH: There's the viper under our flower, this Francis.

He should be on the winning side.

CECIL: He will be yet . . .

Like all wise men. For myself, I no longer Stomach Lord Essex. Every word he speaks Makes me feel queasy.

RALEIGH: Then why put up with him?

CECIL: The queen, my friend, the queen. What she wants she will have,

And she must have her earl.

RALEIGH: Which does she love more,

Her earl or her kingdom?

CECIL: Yes, which? I have wondered. RALEIGH: Then you're less sapient

Than I've always thought you, Cecil. She loves her kingdom

More than all men, and always will. If he could Be made to look like a rebel, which he's close to being . . .

And she could be made to believe it, which is harder, You'd be first man in the council.

CECIL: And you would be? . . .

RALEIGH: Wherever I turn he's stood

Square in my way! My life long here at court

He's snatched honor and favor from before my eyes
Till his voice and walk and aspect make me writhe . . .

There's a fatality in it!

CECIL: If he could be sent from England . . . we might have a chance

To come between them.

RALEIGH: Would she let him go?

CECIL: No . . . but if he could be teased And stung about his generalship till he was Too angry to reflect. . . . Suppose you were proposed

As general for the next Spanish raid?

RALEIGH: He would see it,

And so would she.

CECIL: Then if you were named

For the expedition to Ireland?

RALEIGH: No, I thank you.

He'd let me go, and I'd be sunk in a bog

This next three hundred years. I've seen enough

Good men try to conquer Ireland. CECIL: Then how would this be?

We name three men for Ireland of his own sup-

He will oppose them, not wishing his party weakened

At the court. Then we ask what he suggests And hint at his name for leader. . . .

RALEIGH: Good so far.

CECIL: He will be angry and hint at your name; you will offer

To go if he will.

RALEIGH: No. Not to Ireland.

CECIL: Yes!

Do you think he'd let you go with him and share The military glory? It will go hard,

Having once brought up his name, if we do not manage

To ship him alone to Dublin.

RALEIGH: We can try it, then,

Always remembering that no matter what Is said . . . no matter what I say or you . . .

I do not go. You must get me out of that,

By Christ, for I know Ireland.

CECIL: I will. Be easy.

RALEIGH: When is the council?

CECIL: At nine.

RALEIGH: You'll make these suggestions?

CECIL: If you'll play up to them.

RALEIGH: Count on me. I must look after These silver soldiers.

CECIL: At nine then.

RALEIGH: Count on me.

[They go out in opposite directions]

CURTAIN

SCENE II.

The queen's study, which adjoins her bed-chambers and the council hall. It is a severe little room, with chairs, a desk, and a few books, huge and leather-bound. Penelope comes in from the bed-chamber and looks out through a curtain opposite. She returns to the chamber, then re-enters to wait. Essex enters.

PENELOPE: [Rising] Good-morrow, my lord.

ESSEX: Good-morrow, Penelope. Have I kept the queen?

PENELOPE: If so, would I acknowledge it?

ESSEX: I commend me to your discretion.

PENELOPE: Only to my discretion?

essex: Take her what message you will . . . only let it be that I am here.

PENELOPE: May I have one moment, my lord? She is not quite ready.

ESSEX: As many as you like. What is it, my dear? PENELOPE: Do you love the queen?

ESSEX: Is that a fair question, as between maid and man?

PENELOPE: An honest question.

ESSEX: Then I will answer honestly. Yes, my dear.

PENELOPE: Dearly?

essex: Yes.

PENELOPE: I would you loved someone who loved you better.

ESSEX: Meaning . . . whom?

PENELOPE: Meaning . . . no one. Myself, perhaps. That's no one. Or . . . anyone who loved you better.

ESSEX: Does she not love me, sweet?

PENELOPE: She loves you, loves you not, loves you, loves you not. . . .

ESSEX: And why do you tell me this?

PENELOPE: Because I am afraid.

ESSEX: For me?

PENELOPE: I have heard her when she thought she was alone, walk up and down her room sound-lessly, night long, cursing you . . . cursing you because she must love you and could not help herself . . . swearing to be even with you for this love she scorns to bear you. My lord, you anger her too much

ESSEX: But is this not common to lovers?

PENELOPE: No, I have never cursed you. And I have good cause.

ESSEX: But if I were your lover, you would, sweet. So thank God I am not.

PENELOPE: I must go and tell her you are here. [She lifts her face to be kissed] Good-bye.

ESSEX: Good-bye, my dear. [He kisses her] And thank you.

PENELOPE: Will you beware of her?

essex: Lover, beware your lover, might well be an old maxim: I will beware.

PENELOPE: For I am afraid.

[A Maid-in-Waiting appears in the doorway] MAID: Her Majesty is ready.

PENELOPE: I will tell her my lord is here.

[She runs out hastily. Elizabeth enters, signing imperiously to the Maid, who disappears. There is a moment's silence]

ELIZABETH: When we met last it was, as I remember.

Ill-met by moonlight, sir.

essex: Well-met by day,

My queen.

ELIZABETH: I had hardly hoped to see you again, My lord of Essex, after what was vowed

Forever when you left. ESSEX: You are unkind

To remind me.

ELIZABETH: I think I also used

The word forever, and meant it as much, at least... Therefore, no apology. Only my Penelope Passed me just now in the door with eyes and lips That looked the softer for kissing. I'm not sure

But I'm inopportune.

ESSEX: She's a crazy child.

ELIZABETH: A child! That's for me, too, no doubt! These children

Have their little ways with each other!

essex: Must we begin

With charges and counter-charges, when you know. . . .

ELIZABETH: Do I indeed? . . .

You have been gone a week, at this Wanstock of yours . . .

And a week's a long time at court. You forget that I Must live and draw breath whether I see you or not . . .

And there are other men and women, oh yes, all fully Equipped for loving and being loved! Penelope . . . You find Penelope charming. And as for me

There's always Mountjoy . . . or Sir Walter . . . the handsome,

Sir Walter, the silver-plated . . .

ESSEX: He'll wear no more

Silver at your door.

ELIZABETH: What have you done . . . come, tell me.

I knew this silver would draw fire. What happened? ESSEX: Nothing . . . but the fashion's gone out. ELIZABETH: No, but tell me!

ESSEX: He happened to be in the way When the upstairs pot was emptied.

He's gone to change his clothes.

ELIZABETH: You shall not be allowed

To do this to him . . .

ESSEX: [Moving toward her] You shall not be allowed

To mock me, my queen. [He kisses her]

ELIZABETH: Isn't it strange how one man's kiss can grow

To be like any other's . . . or a woman's

To be like any woman's?

essex: Not yours for me,

No, and not mine for you, you lying villain,

You villain and queen, you double-tongued seductress.

You bitch of brass!

ELIZABETH: Silver, my dear. Let me be A bitch of silver. It reminds me of Raleigh.

essex: Damn vou!

ELIZABETH: Damn you and double-damn you for a damner!

Come some day when I'm in the mood. What day's this? . . .

Thursday? Try next Wednesday . . . or any Wednesday

Later on in the summer . . . Any summer

Will do. Why are you still here?

essex: Oh, God, if I could but walk out that door And stay away!

ELIZABETH: It's not locked. ESSEX: But I'd come back!

Where do you think I've been this last week? Trying, Trying not to be here! But you see, I am here.

ELIZABETH: Yes, I see.

ESSEX: Why did you plague me without a word? ELIZABETH: Why did you not come?

ESSEX: You are a queen, my queen. You had proscribed me.

Sent formal word I'd not be admitted if I came. ELIZABETH: I may have meant it at the time.

ESSEX: I think I have a demon, and you are it! ELIZABETH: If ever a mocking devil tortured a woman

You're my devil and torture me! Let us part and quickly,

Or there'll be worse to come. Go.

ESSEX: I tell you I will not.

ELIZABETH: Come to me, my Essex. Let us be kind

For a moment. I will be kind. You need not be. You are young and strangely winning and strangely

My heart goes out to you wherever you are.

And something in me has drawn you. But this same thing

That draws us together hurts and blinds us until We strike at one another. This has gone on

A long while. It grows worse with the years. It will end badly.

Go, my dear, and do not see me again.

ESSEX: All this

Is what I said when last I went away.

Yet here I am.

ELIZABETH: Love someone else, my dear.

I will forgive you.

ESSEX: You mean you would try to forgive me. ELIZABETH: Ave. but I would.

ESSEX: What would you have to forgive? I have tried to love others. It's empty as ashes.

ELIZABETH: What others?

ESSEX: No one.

ELIZABETH: What others?

ESSEX: Everyone. ELIZABETH: Everyone?

ESSEX: That too has been your triumph! What is

Of love in the night, when I am sick and angry
And care not? I would rather hear your mocking laughter——

Your laughter—mocking at me—defying me Ever to be happy—with another.

ELIZABETH: You have done this to me?

essex: You have done this to me! You've made it all empty

Away from you! And with you too!

ELIZABETH: And me—what of me while you were gone?

essex: If we

Must quarrel when we meet, why then, for God's sake.

Let us quarrel. At least we can quarrel together.

ELIZABETH: I think if we are to love we must love and be silent——

For when we speak——

ESSEX: I'll be silent then.

And you shall speak-

ELIZABETH: [Her finger to her lips] Hush! ESSEX: If you would sometimes heed me—

ELIZABETH: Hush!

essex: Only sometimes—only when I'm right. If you would Say to yourself that even your lover might be Right sometimes, instead of flying instantly Into opposition as soon as I propose

A shift in policy!

ELIZABETH: But you were wrong! You were wrong!

A campaign into Spain's pure madness, and to strike at Flanders

At the same moment . . . think of the drain in men And the drain on the treasury, and the risks we'd run

Of being unable to follow success or failure For lack of troops and money . . . !

ESSEX: [Letting his arms fall] But why lack money . . .

And why lack men? There's no richer country in Europe

In men or money than England! It's this same ancient Unprofitable niggardliness that pinches pennies

And wastes a world of treasure! You could have all Spain.

And Spain's dominions in the new world, an empire Of untold wealth . . . and you forgo them because You fear to lay new taxes!

ELIZABETH: I have tried that . .

And never yet has a warlike expedition

Brought me back what it cost!

ESSEX: You've tried half-measures . . .

Raids on the Spanish coast, a few horsemen sent Into Flanders and out again, always defeating Yourself by trying too little! What I plead for Is to be bold once, just once, give the gods a chance To be kind to us . . . walk through this cobweb Philip

And take his lazy cities with a storm Of troops and ships!

If we are to trifle we might better sit

At home forever, and rot!

ELIZABETH: Here we sit then,

And rot, as you put it. ESSEX: I'm sorry. . . .

ELIZABETH: It seems to me

We rot to some purpose here. I have kept the peace And kept my people happy and prosperous.

essex: And at what a price . . .

What a cowardly price!

ELIZABETH: I am no coward, either.

It requires more courage not to fight than to fight When one is surrounded by hasty hot-heads, urging Campaigns in all directions.

essex: Think of the name

You will leave. . . . They will set you down in histories

As the weasel queen who fought and ran away, Who struck one stroke, preferably in the back, And then turned and ran. . . .

ELIZABETH: Is it my fame you think of, Or your own, my lord? Have you not built your name

High enough? I gave you your chance at Cadiz, And you took it, and now there's no name in all England

Like yours to the common people. When we ride in the streets

Together, it's Essex they cheer and not their queen. What more would you have?

essex: Is it for fear of me

And this hollow cheering you hold me back from Spain?

ELIZABETH: It's because I believe in peace, and have no faith

In wars or what wars win.

ESSEX: You do not fear me?

ELIZABETH: Yes, and I fear you, too! You believe yourself

Fitter to be king than I to be queen! You are flattered

By this crying of your name by fools! You trust me no more Than you'd trust . . . Penelope . . . or any other woman

To be in power! You believe you'd rule England better

Because you're a man!

ESSEX: That last is true. I would.

And that doesn't mean I don't love you . . . remember that.

I love you, my queen, madly, beyond all measure, But that's not to say I cannot see where you fail As sovereign here, and see that why you fail When you do is merely because a woman cannot Act and think like a man,

ELIZABETH: Act and think like a man . . . ! Why should I Think like a man when a woman's thinking's wiser? What do you plan? To depose me, take over the kingdom?

ESSEX: [Smiling] You are a touchy queen.

ELIZABETH: I had bad bringing up.

I was never sure who my mother was going to be Next day, and it shook my nerves.

essex: You're your father's daughter,

I'll swear to that. I can tell by your inconstancy.

ELIZABETH: I wish you had need

To fear for me . . . or at any rate that I'd never Let you see how much I'm yours.

essex: But why?

ELIZABETH: Tell me, my dear,

Do you tire of me . . . do I wear upon you a little? ESSEX: Never.

ELIZABETH: But you'd have to say that, you can see . . .

You'd have to say it, because you wouldn't hurt me, And because I'm your queen. And so I'll never know Until everyone else has known and is laughing at me.

When I've lost you. Wait, let me say this, please . . . When the time

Does come, and I seem old to you, and you love Someone else, tell me, tell me the first . . .

ESSEX: You are not old! I will not have you old! ELIZABETH: Will you do that, in all kindness, in memory

Of great love past? No. You could not, could not. It's not in a man to be kind that way, nor in

A woman to take it kindly. I think I'd kill you, In a first blind rage.

ESSEX: Kill me when I can say it. ELIZABETH: Love, will you let me Say one more thing that will hurt you?

essex: Anything.

ELIZABETH: Your blood's on fire to lead a new command

Now that you've won so handsomely in Spain, And when I need a general anywhere You'll ask to go. Don't ask it . . . and don't go. You're better here in London. ESSEX: Was this all you Wanted? [Stepping back]

To make me promise this?

ELIZABETH: [Softly] Not for myself,
I swear it, not because I think you reckless
With men and money, though I do think that,
Not because you might return in too much triumph
And take my kingdom from me, which I can imagine.

And not because I want to keep you here
And hate to risk you, though that's also true . . .
But rather . . . and for this you must forgive me . . .

Because you're more a poet than general . . . And I fear you might fail, and lose what you have gained.

If you went again.

ESSEX: God's death! Whom would you send? ELIZABETH: I asked you not to be angry. ESSEX: Not to be angry!

How do you judge a leader except by whether He wins or loses? Was it by chance, do you think, That I took Cadir?

That I took Cadiz?

ELIZABETH: Very well. You shall go. Go if you will. Only I love you, and I say

What would be wiser.

ESSEX: You choose the one thing I must have And ask me not to ask it! No. Forgive me.

ELIZABETH: I'll not say it again.
ESSEX: But if I'm more poet than
General, why poets make better generals
Than generals do, on occasion.

ELIZABETH: You've proved it so.

On more than one occasion.

[A clock strikes. She rises]

There's the chime.

The council's waiting, and we shall hear about Ireland,

If Cecil has his way. One thing remember,

You must not go to Ireland. ESSEX: No. That's a war

I'm content to miss.

ELIZABETH: Thank God for that much then. I've been afraid

Ireland might tempt you. And one more thing remember . . .

I'll have to oppose you in the council on

The Spanish hostages.... You'll have your way...

But I'll have to oppose you, lest they think it's your kingdom....

Will you understand . . . ?

ESSEX: I'll play my part perfectly.

[He kisses her hand, then her lips]

ELIZABETH: Now what can come between us, out of heaven or hell,

Or Spain or England?

ESSEX: Nothing . . . never again.

CURTAIN

SCENE III.

The same as Scene I, save that the doors to the council room have been thrown back, revealing a chair of state for the Queen, and beneath it a table at which her Councillors sit. The Guards are placed at left and right. The Queen sits in her chair, Raleigh, Cecil, Essex, Burghley, Howard, and one or two others are at the table. The queen's Jester sits crosslegged on a mat. Burghley is speaking.

BURGHLEY: It is quite true we shall have an enemy in Spain while Philip lives and his state has power

To wage war on us, but there is little he can do Against an island as well walled as ours. He has tried his best, and failed. My lord of Essex Says it cost more to fight Spain every year In this chronic fashion than it would to throw A challenge down, raid the Escurial And sack the empire. With this the weight of the council

Disagrees, and we may hold it settled That our tactics continue defensive till the queen Rule otherwise.

ELIZABETH: You'll wait some time for that.

BURGHLEY: But in the matter Of the Spanish ransoms it appears to me

Lord Essex has right on his side. The English soldiers Who brought their prisoners home from the last raid Deserve their prize money. By immemorial custom The ransom belongs to the taker of the prisoner And not to the state.

ELIZABETH: That I intend to change, That same immemorial custom. I thought you had Informed, Lord Burghley, that it was my will That the Spanish ransoms be paid to the treasury. BURGHLEY: But my lord of Essex . . .

ELIZABETH: My lord of Essex does not speak for

I was told this expedition into Spain Would be paid for in booty. The cost, so far, Has not been made up; and since there are Spanish nobles

To be ransomed, I think they should pay it. essex: Your Majesty,

I do not speak for myself . . . I took no prizes . . . But only to redeem my word. I assured My followers that they would have for their own Whatever ransoms they earned. ELIZABETH: And by what right

Did you make this promise?

ESSEX: By this same ancient custom

Of which Lord Burghley speaks. A custom so well Established there's not a soldier anywhere But takes it for granted.

ELIZABETH: Your word is pledged?

ESSEX: It is.

ELIZABETH: [Smiling] And if the state should confiscate these ransoms

You would make them good to the captors?

ESSEX: No. To speak frankly . . . [He smiles]

No.

ELIZABETH: Then the issues lies between the queen And her soldiers . . . and your lordship need feel no Concern in the matter.

ESSEX: When I made these promises I spoke for Your Majesty . . . or believed I did. ELIZABETH: Master Cecil, advise us; am I as queen Bound by Lord Essex's promise?

CECIL: No, my liege;

It is well known a regent may repudiate Treaty or word of a subject officer. The throne is not bound.

ESSEX: If it comes to repudiation,

The throne can, of course, repudiate what it likes. But not without breaking faith.

ELIZABETH: I fear we are wrong, Sir Robert; And what has been promised for me and in my name

By my own officer, my delegate in the field, I must perform. The men may have their ransoms. The state will take its loss; for this one time Only, and this the last. In the future a prisoner Is held in the name of the state, and whatever price

Is on his head belongs to the crown. Our action Here is made no precedent. What further Business is there before us?

CECIL: There is one perpetual Subject, Your Majesty, which we take up Time after time, and always leave unsettled, But which has come to a place where we must act One way or another. Tyrone's rebellion in Ulster Is no longer a smouldering coal, but a running fire Spreading north to south. We must conquer Ireland Finally now, or give over what we have won. Ireland's not Spain.

ELIZABETH: I grant you. THE FOOL: I also grant you. ELIZABETH: Be quiet, fool. THE FOOL: Be quiet, fool. [He slaps his own mouth] ELIZABETH: Lord Burghley,

You shall speak first. What's to be done in Ireland? BURGHLEY: If my son is right, and I believe him to be.

We can bide our time no longer there. They have Some help from Spain, and will have more, no doubt,

And the central provinces are rising. We must Stamp out this fire or lose the island.

ELIZABETH: This means Men, money, ships?

BURGHLEY: Yes, madam.

CECIL: And more than that . . .

A leader.

I. iii FLIZABETH: What leader? CECIL: A Lord Protector Of Ireland who can carry sword and fire From one end of the bogs to the other, and have English law On Irish rebels till there are no rebels. We've governed Ireland with our left hand, so far, And our hold is slipping. The man who goes there now Must be one fitted to master any field . . . The best we have. ELIZABETH: What man? Name one. CECIL: We should send. Unless I am wrong, a proved and able general, Of no less rank, say, than Lord Howard here, Lord Essex, Sir Walter Raleigh, Knollys, or Mountjoy . . This is no slight matter, to keep or lose the island. ELIZABETH: I grant you that also. THE FOOL: I also grant you. Be quiet, Fool! [He slaps his mouth] ELIZABETH: I ask you for one and you name a dozen, Sir Robert. RALEIGH: Why should one go alone, if it comes To that? Why not two expeditions, one To Dublin, one into Ulster, meeting halfway? ELIZABETH: Are there two who could work together? CECIL: Knollys and Mountjoy. They are friends and of one house. ESSEX: Yes, of my house. ELIZABETH: Essex, whom would you name? ESSEX: Why, since Lord Cecil Feels free to name my followers, I shall feel free To name one or two of his. . . . ELIZABETH: In other words, You would rather Knollys and Mountjoy did not go? ESSEX: I would rather they stayed in England, as Sir Robert knows. I have need of them here. But I will spare one of If Lord Cecil will let Sir Francis Vere go with him. ELIZABETH: Let Vere and Knollys go. CECIL: Lord Essex names Sir Francis Vere because he knows full well I cannot spare him, my liege. ELIZABETH: Is this appointment To wait for all our private bickerings? Can we send no man of worth to Ireland, merely Because to do so would weaken some house or party Here at court? THE FOOL: Your Majesty has said . . . ELIZABETH: Be quiet. . . . THE FOOL: Fool! ELIZABETH: Be quiet! THE FOOL: Fool!

ELIZABETH: Be quiet!

but makes no sound]

[The Fool forms the word "fool" with his lips,

CECIL: [Rising] I hope I betray no secret, Sir If I tell the council that I spoke with you Before the session, and asked you if you would go Into Ireland if the queen requested it . . . and that Yes, should the queen desire it. BURGHLEY: That would answer. CECIL: But I believe, and Sir Walter believes, there should be More than one hand in this . . . that if he goes Lord Essex should go with him. ELIZABETH: With him? essex: In what Capacity? CECIL: Leading an equal command. Two generals Of coeval power, landing north and south And meeting to crush Tyrone. ESSEX: Would you set up Two Lord Protectors? CECIL: It was my thought that we name Raleigh as Lord Protector. ESSEX: And I under him? CECIL: Since the Azores adventure Which my Lord Essex led, and which came off A little lamer than could be wished, but in which Sir Walter showed to very great advantage, It has seemed to me that Raleigh should receive First place if he served in this. ESSEX: [Rising] This is deliberate, An insult planned! CECIL: It is no insult, my lord, But plain truth. I speak for the good of the state. ESSEX: You lie! You have never spoken here or elsewhere For any cause but your own! ELIZABETH: No more of this! ESSEX: The good of the state! Good God! Am I to swallow this from a clerk, a pen-pusher . . . To be told I may have second place, for the good of CECIL: Were you not wrong at the Azores? essex: No, by God! And you know it! ELIZABETH: Whoever makes you angry has won Already, Essex! ESSEX: They have planned this! CECIL: I say no more. Raleigh will go to Ireland as Lord Protector And go alone, if the queen asks it of him, And since you will not go. ESSEX: I have not said I would not go. But if I were to go I would go Alone, as Lord Protector! ELIZABETH: That you will not. I have some word in this. ESSEX: If this pet rat Lord Cecil wishes to know my mind about him, And it seems he does, he shall have it! How he first crept Into favor here I know not, but the palace is riddled With his spying and burrowing and crawling underground!

He has filled the court with his rat friends, very gentle,

White, squeaking, courteous folk, who show their teeth

Only when cornered; who smile at you, speak you fair

And spend their nights gnawing the floors and chairs Out from under us all!

ELIZABETH: My lord!

ESSEX: I am

Not the gnawing kind, nor will I speak fair
To those who don't mean me well . . . no, nor to those

To whom I mean no good! I say frankly here, Yes, to their faces, that Cecil and Walter Raleigh Have made themselves my enemies because They cannot brook greatness or power in any but Themselves! And I say this to them . . . and to the world. . . .

I, too, have been ambitious, as all men are Who bear a noble mind, but if I rise It will be by my own effort, and not by dragging Better men down through intrigue! I admit Sir Walter Raleigh's skill as a general And Cecil's statecraft! I could work with them freely And cheerfully, but every time I turn My back they draw their knives! When Cecil left

England
I guarded his interests as I would my own
Because he asked me to . . . but when I left,
And left my affairs in his hands . . . on my return
I found my plans and my friends out in the rain
Along with the London beggars!

CECIL: I did my best. . . .

ESSEX: Aye . . . the best for yourself! For the good of the state!

RALEIGH: If Lord Essex wishes
To say he is my enemy, very well . . .
He is my enemy.

ESSEX: But you were mine first. . . .

And I call the gods to witness you would be my friend

Still, if I'd had my way! I take it hard

That here, in the queen's council, where there should be Magnanimous minds if anywhere, there is still No trust or friendship!

ELIZABETH: I take it hard that you

Should quarrel before me.

ESSEX: Would you have us quarrel Behind your back? It suits them all too well

To quarrel in secret and knife men down in the dark!

BURGHLEY: This is fantastic, my lord. There has been no knifing.

Let us come to a decision. We were discussing The Irish protectorate.

CECIL: And as for Ireland.

I am willing to leave that in Lord Essex' hands To do as he decides.

ESSEX: Send your Sir Walter

To Ireland as Protector! And be damned to it! CECIL: As the queen wishes.

It is a task both difficult and dangerous. I cannot blame Lord Essex for refusing To risk his fame there.

ESSEX: There speaks the white rat again!
Yet even a rat should know I have never refused
A task out of fear! I said I would not go

As second in command!

CECIL: Then would you go

As Lord Protector?

ELIZABETH: You have named your man . . . Sir Walter Raleigh.

RALEIGH: I'll go if Essex goes. ESSEX: What! Is our Raleigh

Afraid to go alone?

RALEIGH: I don't care for it . . .

And neither does our Essex! ESSEX: Why, what is this

That hangs over Ireland! Is it haunted, this Ireland? Is it a kind of hell where men are damned If they set foot on it? I've never seen the place, But if it's a country like other countries, with people

Like other people in it, it's nothing to be Afraid of, more than France or Wales or Flanders Or anywhere else!

CECIL: We hear you say so.

essex: If I

Am challenged to go to Ireland, then, Christ, I'll go! Give me what men and horse I need, and put me In absolute charge, and if I fail to bring This Tyrone's head back with me, and put the rebellion

To sleep forever, take my sword from me And break it . . . I'll never use it again! ELIZABETH: Will you listen . . . ?

ESSEX: They've challenged me! ELIZABETH: If you volunteer

To go to Ireland there is none to stop you. You are first soldier here, first in acclaim And in achievement, but since the decision lies With yourself alone, reflect a little.

essex: My queen,

I can see that Raleigh and Cecil have set themselves To bait me into Ireland! They know and I know That Ireland has been deadly to any captain Who risked his fortunes there; moreover, once I'm gone they think to strip me here at home, Ruin me both ways! And I say to them: "Try it!" There are men who are greater than Ireland or their chicane. . . .

Since this is a challenge I go, and go alone, And return victorious, and, by God, more of a problem

To Cecils and Raleighs than when I went!

[The Fool rises and approaches Essex from behind]

BURGHLEY: If Essex

Will go, it solves our problem, Your Majesty.

We could hardly refuse that offer.

ELIZABETH: No. ESSEX: I will go,

And I will return! Mark me!

THE FOOL: [Touching Essex] My lord! my lord! ESSEX: [Turning suddenly with an instinctive motion that sweeps the Fool to the floor] Take your hands off me! You touch me for a fool?

[He helps the Fool up]

Get up!

THE FOOL: Do not go to Ireland! ESSEX: [Impatiently] You too?

THE FOOL: Because, my lord, I come from Ireland,

All the best fools come from Ireland, but only

A very great fool will go there.

ESSEX: Faugh!

THE FOOL: It's not too late yet!

ELIZABETH: Break up the council, my lords.

We meet tomorrow.

BURGHLEY: And this is decided?

ESSEX: Yes.

ELIZABETH: Yes, if you wish it. Go now.

[The Council rises when the queen does and files out silently, leaving Essex and Elizabeth]

You should have had

The fool's brain and he yours! You would have bettered

By the exchange.

ESSEX: I thank you kindly, lady. ELIZABETH: What malicious star

Danced in my sky when you were born, I wonder? ESSEX: What malicious star danced in the sky

Of Ireland, you should ask.

ELIZABETH: Oh, my dear,

You are a child in council. I saw them start To draw you into this, and tried to warn you . . .

But it was no use.

ESSEX: They drew me into nothing.

I saw their purpose and topped it with my own.

Let them believe they've sunk me.

ELIZABETH: You will withdraw.

I'll countermand this.

ESSEX: And give them the laugh on me?

I'll have the laugh on them yet.

ELIZABETH: Better they should laugh A little now than laugh at you forever.

ESSEX: And why not win in Ireland?

ELIZABETH: No man wins there.

You're so dazzled

With the chance to lead an army you'd follow the

In an assault on heaven.

ESSEX: No, but I'd lead him.

Heaven is always taken by storm That's one thing

The devil doesn't know. Ireland is only

A country, and this is superstition.

ELIZABETH: I know.

You were quite right. I thought so as you said it.

Only somehow here in my breast something constricts . . .

Is it the heart grows heavy? I must let you go . . . And I'll never see you again.

ESSEX: Mistrust all these

Forebodings. When they prove correct we remember

But when they're wrong we forget them. They mean nothing.

Remember this when I'm back and all turns out well . . .

That you felt all would turn out badly.

ELIZABETH: Oh, my love,

Come touch me, tell me all will happen well.

ESSEX: And so it will.

ELIZABETH: Do you want to go?

ESSEX: Why yes . . .

And no. I've said I would and I will.

ELIZABETH: It's not yet

Too late. There are no announcements made, no orders

Given. If you win, that will divide us . . .

And if you lose, that will divide us too.

ESSEX: I'll win, and it will not divide us. Is it so hard

To believe in me?

ELIZABETH: No . . . I'll believe in you . . .

And even forgive you if you need it. Here.

My father gave me this ring . . . and told me if ever

He lost his temper with me, to bring it to him And he'd forgive me. And so it saved my life . . . Long after, when he'd forgotten, long after, when One time he was angry.

ESSEX: Darling, if ever

You're angry rings won't help.

ELIZABETH: Yes, it would.

I'd think of you as you are now, and it would. Take it.

ESSEX: I have no pledge from you. I'll take it To remember you in absence.

ELIZABETH: Take it for a better reason. Take it because

The years are long, and full of sharp, wearing days

That wear out what we are and what we have been

And change us into people we do not know, Living among strangers. Lest you and I who love Should wake some morning strangers and enemies In an alien world, far off; take my ring, my lover.

essex: You fear

You will not always love me?

ELIZABETH: No, that you

Will not love me, and will not let me love you. [She puts the ring on his finger]

CURTAIN

ACT II. SCENE I.

The queen's study. Penelope is sitting reading. The Fool enters. She does not see him.

THE FOOL: Sh! Make no noise. PENELOPE: What do you mean? THE FOOL: Silence! Quiet! PENELOPE: I am silent, fool.

THE FOOL: You silent? And even as you say it you are talking!

PENELOPE: You began it. THE FOOL: Began what? PENELOPE: Talking.

THE FOOL: Oh, no. Talking began long before my time. It was a woman began it. PENELOPE: Her name?

THE FOOL: Penelope, I should judge.

PENELOPE: Fool.

THE FOOL: [Looking away] No, for with this same Penelope began also beauty and courage and tenderness and faith . . . all that a man could desire or a woman offer . . . and all that this early Penelope began has a later Penelope completed.

PENELOPE: [Rising] It lacked only this . . . that the court fool should make love to me.

THE FOOL: I am sorry to have been laggard. But truly I have never found you alone before.

PENELOPE: How lucky I've been! THE FOOL: Are you angered?

PENELOPE: At what?

THE FOOL: At my loving you.

PENELOPE: I've learned to bear nearly everything.

THE FOOL: A lover's absence? PENELOPE: Among other things.

THE FOOL: The presence of suitors undesired?

PENELOPE: That, too.

THE FOOL: I am not a suitor, my lady. I ask nothing. I know where your heart lies. It is with my Lord Essex in Ireland. I do not love you.

PENELOPE: Good.

THE FOOL: I lied to you. I do love you.

PENELOPE: I am sorry.

THE FOOL: You will not laugh at me?

PENELOPE: No.

THE FOOL: Then there is yet some divinity in the world . . . while a woman can still be sorry for one who loves her without return.

PENELOPE: A woman is sadly aware that when a man loves her it makes a fool of him.

THE FOOL: And if a fool should love a woman . . . would it not make a man of him?

PENELOPE: No, but doubly a fool, I fear.

THE FOOL: And the women . . . how of the women?

PENELOPE: They have been fools, too.

THE FOOL: The more fool I, I tried to save Lord Essex from Ireland . . . but he needs must go . . . the more fool he.

PENELOPE: Let us not talk of that.

THE FOOL: May I kiss you?

PENELOPE: No.

THE FOOL: Your hand?

PENELOPE: Yes. [He kisses her hand]

THE FOOL: I thank you.

[She touches his fool's cap gently with her hand

PENELOPE: The more fool you, poor boy.

[Robert Cecil enters from the left]

CECIL: This is hardly a seemly pastime, Mistress Gray.

PENELOPE: And are you now the judge of what is seemly, Sir Robert?

CECIL: [To the Fool] Be off with you! [To Penelope] The queen is expecting Master Bacon here? [The Fool goes]

PENELOPE: I am set to wait for him.

CECIL: You will not be needed.

PENELOPE: Excellent.

[She goes out right, passing Raleigh, who enters]

CECIL: This Bacon keeps himself close. I have been unable to speak with him. She has this news? RALEIGH: Yes.

CECIL: She believes it?

RALEIGH: Burghley himself believes it.

CECIL: Then she does.

RALEIGH: Beyond question.

[The curtains part at the left and Bacon enters]

CECIL: Good morrow, Master Bacon.

BACON: And to you, my lords.

CECIL: I have sent everywhere for you, sir, this three hours . . . and perhaps it was not altogether by accident that I could not find you.

BACON: I was not at home. You must forgive me.

CECIL: You are here to see the queen?

BACON: [Bowing] The queen has also been good enough to send for me.

CECIL: It was my wish to speak with you first . . . and it is my opinion that it will be the better for all of us, if I do so now . . . late as it is.

BACON: I am but barely on time, gentlemen.

CECIL: You need answer one question only. You have been in correspondence with Lord Essex in Ireland?

BACON: Perhaps.

CECIL: The queen has this morning received news warning her that Lord Essex is allied with the Irish rebels and is even now leading his army back to England to usurp her throne. Had you heard this?

BACON: No.

CECIL: Do you credit it?

BACON: It is your own scheme, I believe.

CECIL: That Essex should rebel against the queen?

BACON: Even so.

RALEIGH: You accuse us of treason?

BACON: If the queen were aware of certain matters she would herself accuse you of treason.

CECIL: What matters?

BACON: I prefer that the queen should question me.

CECIL: Look to yourself, Master Bacon. If you intend to accuse any man of the suppression of letters written by Essex to the queen, or of the suppression of letters sent by the queen to Essex, you will be unable to prove these assertions and you will argue yourself very neatly into the Tower.

BACON: My lord . . . I had no such business in mind.

RALEIGH: Then what? . . .

BACON: I hope I can keep my own counsel. The truth is, my lords, you are desperate men. You have overreached yourselves, and if wind of it gets to the royal ears you are done.

RALEIGH: We shall drag a few down with us if we are done, though, and you the first.

CECIL: You have but a poor estimate of me, Master Bacon. If you go in to the queen and reveal to her that her letters to Essex have not reached him . . . as you mean to do . . . the queen will then send for me, and I will send for Lord Essex' last letter to you, containing a plan for the capture of the city of London. It will interest you to know that I have read that letter and you are learned enough in the law to realize in what light you will stand as a witness should the queen see it.

BACON: I think it is true, though, that if I go down I shall also drag a few with me, including those here present.

CECIL: I am not so sure of that either. I am not unready for that contingency. But to be frank with you, it would be easier for both you and us if you were on our side.

BACON: You must expect a man to side with his friends.

CECIL: And a man's friends . . . who are they? Those who can help him to what he wants.

BACON: Not always.

CECIL: When he is wise. You have served Lord Essex well and I believe he has made you promises. But the moment Essex enters England in rebellion, he is doomed, and his friends with him.

BACON: One word from the queen to him... one word from him to the queen ... one word from me, revealing that their letters have been intercepted, and there can be no talk of rebellion. There has been some underhand traffic with the couriers between here and Ireland. Their letters have been lost, you have induced the queen to promulgate arbitrary orders ... and since they are both proud, you have bred distrust in her and defiance in him. Your machinations have been so direct, so childish, so simple ... and so simply exposed ... that I wonder at you!

CECIL: My friend, a child could trip him. Not so simple as your own. I have news this morning that Lord Essex has already landed in England and set up his standard here. He is a rebel, and when a man is once a rebel, do you think there will be any careful inquiry into how he happened to become one?

BACON: Essex in England!

CECIL: In England.

RALEIGH: And has neglected to disband his army. CECIL: You speak of explanations between the queen and Essex. Unless you betray us there will be no explanations. They are at war and will never meet again.

BACON: That is, if your plan succeed.

CECIL: [Standing aside] Very well, then. Go in. You have chosen your master. I have done with you. BACON: [Not moving] And if I say nothing?

CECIL: Then . . . whatever you have been promised, whatever you have desired, that you shall have. There is no place in the courts you could not fill. You shall have your choice. If you need excuse, no one should know better than you that this Essex is a danger to the state, a danger to the queen, a danger to liberty.

BACON: If I need excuse I shall find one for myself.

[There is a pause. Then the curtain parts to the right and Penelope enters. She holds the curtain back]

PENELOPE: Yes, Your Majesty; he is here.

ELIZABETH: Why was I not told? [She enters] Is this an ante-chamber, Sir Robert? Am I never to look out of my room without seeing you?

CECIL: Your pardon, Your Majesty. I was just going.

ELIZABETH: Then go. You need not pause to explain why you came. I am weary of your face!

CECIL: Yes, Your Majesty.

[Cecil and Raleigh bow and depart]

ELIZABETH: I have heard that you are a shrewd man, Master Bacon.

BACON: Flattery, Majesty, flattery.

ELIZABETH: I have heard it,

And in a sort I believe it. Tell me one thing . . .

Are you Cecil's friend?

BACON: I have never been.

ELIZABETH: He is a shrewd man; he's

A man to make a friend of if you'd stand well

In the court, sir.

BACON: It may be so.

ELIZABETH: Why are you not

His friend then?

BACON: We are not on the same side. ELIZABETH: You follow Lord Essex? BACON: Since I have known him.

ELIZABETH: There's

A dangerous man to follow. BACON: Lord Essex?

ELIZABETH: Lord Essex.
BACON: I am sorry, madam,

If I have displeased you.

ELIZABETH: You have displeased me.

BACON: I repeat then . . . I am sorry. ELIZABETH: You will change, then? You will forget This Essex of yours? BACON: If you ask it . . . if there is reason . . . ELIZABETH: Well, there is reason! He has taken up Against me in Ireland. BACON: You are sure of this? ELIZABETH: I have reports. Is it so hard to be-BACON: Without proofs, it is. ELIZABETH: I have proof. BACON: May I ask of what sort? hel ELIZABETH: Proof good enough. You know the punishment For treason? From what I have heard Of late both you and Essex should remember That punishment. BACON: Madam, for myself I have No need to fear, and if Lord Essex has I am more than mistaken in him. ELIZABETH: I am very sorry That I must do this . . . but all friends of Essex Go straightway to the Tower. I have sent for you To give you a last chance to change your mind Before this blow falls. Are you still his friend? BACON: Yes, Majesty. ELIZABETH: I am sorry for it. BACON: That is all? ELIZABETH: Why no. You do not believe me? BACON: I do not. ELIZABETH: And why? BACON: I neither believe our Essex a rebel Nor that you believe so. If you intended to place me In the Tower . . . I would be in the Tower . . . and no talk about it. ELIZABETH: You are shrewd indeed. BACON: I am Essex' friend. ELIZABETH: If that Were true . . . if I could speak to you . . . if there were only The sound of one honest voice! . . I must rule England, And they say he is rebel to me . . . and day and night, Waking, sleeping, in council, there is still always One thing crying out in me over and again . . Waking and sleeping I hear it crying: He cannot, Cannot fail me! But I have written him my love And he has not answered. What you know of this Answer me truly, truly . . . bitter or not, And you shall not lose! BACON: He has not answered? ELIZABETH: No. BACON: If I Knew why I would know much. Have you angered him . . . Sent arbitrary orders?

ELIZABETH: I have ordered him to disband His forces and return. I have cut off Revenue and supplies. BACON: But this was rash . . . To send a popular leader out with an army And then check him suddenly, heap disgrace upon him ... He has great pride. ELIZABETH: [Getting up] He has rebelled then? I wrote him lovingly. BACON: And he answered? . . . ELIZABETH: Nothing. BACON: That could not be excused. ELIZABETH: And it cannot be. It's true. It will not BACON: Dear queen, I fear I have turned you against him! ELIZABETH: No, no! I needed that! BACON: And if there were something wrong . . . Some misunderstanding? . . ELIZABETH: No, no . . . don't try comfort now He had my letters. That could not go wrong. Did he not have my letters? BACON: Could it be otherwise? ELIZABETH: You would know that. You would know if he had not. You've had word from him? BACON: Yes. ELIZABETH: He has written you, But not me! Or are you traitor to him also . . . I think you are! I think you lie to me! I am Encompassed by lies! I think you, too, betray him But subtly, with infinite craft, making me believe First that you would not wrong him! No, no . . . I'm gone mad Pacing my room, pacing the room of my mind. They say a woman's mind is an airless room. Sunless and airless, where she must walk alone Saying he loves me, loves me, loves me not, And has never loved me. The world goes by, all shadows, And there are voices, all echoes till he speaks . . . And there's no light till his presence makes a light There in that room. But I am a queen. Where I walk Is a hall of torture, where the curious gods bring all Their racks and gyves, and stretch me there to writhe Till I cry out. They watch me with eyes of iron Waiting to hear what I cry! I am crying now . . . Listen, you gods of iron! He never loved me . . . He wanted my kingdom only . . . Loose me and let me go! I am yet a queen . . . That I have! That he will not take from me. I shall be queen, and walk his room no more. He thought to break me down by not answering ... Break me until I'd say, I'm all yours . . . what I am And have, all yours! That I will never, never, Never say. Not broken yet.

BACON: Nor will be, Majesty.

ELIZABETH: We must not follow him.

We must forget him, break him as he would break

Bow that bright head . . . I shall be as I was.

See him no more, my friend.

He walks on quicksand. Avoid him.

BACON: Yes, my queen. ELIZABETH: Go, my friend.

You have done well. I trust you. BACON: I thank Your Majesty.

[He goes out. Elizabeth claps her hands twice.

After a moment Captain Armin enters]

ELIZABETH: Captain Armin, keep a watch on Master Bacon.

On his house and on his correspondence.

I wish to know all he knows.

ARMIN: Yes, Your Majesty.

ELIZABETH: Wait. I have found you true of word, And sure of hand. Moreover, you can keep counsel—

[Armin bows. She beckons him to come to her. He does so]

What we say now is forever secret between us— Between us two—not one other.

ARMIN: I'll hold it so.

ELIZABETH: It is reported there is an army risen Against me——

ARMIN: God forbid!

ELIZABETH: It is so reported. The rebellion I speak of's the force

Lord Essex has brought back with him from Ireland. I wish to make this preparation for it: Whatever orders

You receive from your superiors, whatever broils Occur, he is to have free access to my presence.

ARMIN: There would be danger to your person, madam.

ELIZABETH: I will risk that.

ARMIN: You would be hostage if he were in command.

ELIZABETH: Be ready for danger—and if need be, death.

ARMIN: Yes, Majesty.

[He goes out. Elizabeth stands motionless for a moment. There is a sudden burst of girls' laughter in an adjoining room, and the Fool runs in with a garment in his hand. Three Girls run after him, the foremost tripping him so that he falls in a corner and is instantly pounced upon by all three]

MARY: [Entering] Thief! Thief! Stop thief! ELLEN: Kill the slobber thief! Fall on him! TRESSA: Can a maid not keep a silk smock?

THE FOOL: Help! Salvage! Men-at-arms to the rescue! I am boarded by pirates!

[They tickle him]

ELLEN: Tear it from him! He will exhibit it!

TRESSA: No, no! Don't tear it!

THE FOOL: If you sit on me in that fashion, darling, you will regret it. There will be issue!

ELLEN: What issue?

THE FOOL: Twins! Seven or eight!

[Ellen slaps him]

MARY: Rise! Rise quickly! The queen is here. Rise!

[They all get up in confusion]

TRESSA: We are sorry, Your Majesty.

[Elizabeth looks at them without seeing them, and goes out to her bedroom]

ELLEN: What is it? She seemed not to see.
MARY: It's not like her not to strike us.

TRESSA: We'll be whipped.

THE FOOL: No, no. She strikes instantly or not at all.

TRESSA: Give me that.

[She snatches her smock from the Fool]

MARY: Come. [They tiptoe out]

CURTAIN

SCENE II.

The interior of Essex' tent on the coast of England. Essex sits in the light of a candle, reading dispatches. A Guard stands in the shadow. Marvel, an aide, enters]

MARVEL: There is a courier from the queen, my lord.

ESSEX: At last, then.

MARVEL: You will see him at once?

ESSEX: Yes . . . Wait. Bring him in and stay here while I read the dispatches. If I give orders to torture or kill him, show no surprise. You understand?

MARVEL: You will not torture him?

ESSEX: Am I not tortured? And you, too, sirrah. You will remember?

THE GUARD: Yes, my lord.

essex: Good.

[Marvel goes out. Essex rises and stands out of the light, waiting. Marvel enters with the Courier, who falls on his knee before Essex]

THE COURIER: My Lord of Essex?

ESSEX: Yes.

COURIER: Dispatches from the queen. ESSEX: When did you leave London?

COURIER: Four days ago, my lord. We were delayed.

essex: What delayed you?

courier: Robbers.

ESSEX: And they took what from you? COURIER: Our horses and money.

ESSEX: And the letters? . . .

COURTER: Were returned to me untouched.

ESSEX: When did this happen?

COURIER: This side of the ford. There were four armed men against us two.

ESSEX: Give me the letters. [The Courier does so. Essex reads briefly] This is all?

COURIER: Yes, my lord.

ESSEX: You are sure you have lost nothing?

COURIER: Indeed yes, my lord. There was but one missive and the seal was returned unbroken. The cut-throats told us they cared the less about our letters for they could not read.

ESSEX: You are a clever liar, sirrah, and you are the third liar who has come that same road to me from London. You are the third liar to tell this same tale. You shall pay for being the third.

COURIER: My lord, I have not lied to you.

ESSEX: Take his weapons from him, lieutenant. [Marvel obeys] Set him against the post there. Not so gently. He shall lose his ears first and then his lying tongue.

COURIER: Your lordship does not mean this?

ESSEX: And why not? We shall then cut him in pieces . . . but gradually, with infinite delicacy.

[Marvel approaches the Courier with a knife. The Guard holds him]

COURIER: No, no, no, no! Oh, God! Oh, my lord! My lord!

ESSEX: What are you waiting for?

MARVEL: We must tie him to the pole first, sir.

ESSEX: Then tie him!

COURIER: No, no . . . oh, God, no! What do you want of me? I swear to you I haven't lied to you! I swear . . . ugh!

[He is choked]

ESSEX: Let him speak. What do you swear?

COURIER: My lord, I have not lied . . . I speak truth . . .

essex: Tie him up.

COURIER: Let me speak . . . I can . . . ugh . . . ESSEX: Silence him. We know too well what you have done, sirrah. We need no evidence of that. What we ask is that you tell us who set you on . . . and your accomplices. Tell us this and I want no more of you. You shall have your freedom . . . and this . . . [He tosses a clinking bag at his feet] Speak.

courier: My lord, if I knew . . .

ESSEX: Bind him. Truss him up and cut him open. Dispense with these niceties. Have you no knife? [He is bound] We have heard enough! Take out his tongue!

[They approach him. He becomes calm]
COURIER: My lord, I am not a coward, though it may seem to you

I am, for I have cried out . . . but I cried out Not so much for pain or fear of pain

But to know this was Lord Essex, whom I have loved And who tortures innocent men.

ESSEX: Come, silence him!

COURIER: Come then. I am innocent. If my Lord Essex

Is as I have believed him, he will not hurt me; If he will hurt me, then he is not as I

And many thousands believe him, who have loved him.

And I shall not mind much dying.

[A pause]

essex: Let him go.

[They unbind the Courier]

I thought my letters had been tampered with.

You'd tell me if it were so.

courier: My honored lord,

By all the faith I have, and most of it's yours, I'd rather serve you well and lose in doing it

Than serve you badly and gain. If something I've done

Has crossed you or worked you ill I'm enough punished

Only knowing it.

ESSEX: This letter came From the queen's hands?

courier: It is as I received it

From the queen's hands.

essex: There was no other?

COURIER: No other. ESSEX: Take this and go.

[He tosses the bag to the Courier] COURIER: I have brought misfortune . . .

essex: You bring good news. We break camp tomorrow for London . . . Go . . . take that news with you. They'll welcome you outside. Remain with my guard and return with us.

[The Courier goes out]

MARVEL: We march tomorrow?

essex: Yes.

MARVEL: Under orders?

ESSEX: No. [He reads]

"Lord Essex is required to disperse his men And return to the capital straightway on his own Recognizance, to give himself up."

MARVEL: And nothing with this?

ESSEX: Give out the necessary orders, we shall Move at daybreak.

MARVEL: Yes, my lord.

essex: And it is

As well it falls out this way! By right of name And power and popular voice this is my kingdom

This England under my feet, more mine than hers, As she shall learn. It is quite as well.

MARVEL: There is no man

But will think so. There is victory in your path,

My lord. The London citizens will rise

At the first breath of your name.

ESSEX: Yes . . . that I'm sure of.

MARVEL: And with London in your hands . . . well . . . it's your world then . . .

As far as you like.

ESSEX: And I am glad for England.

She has lain fallow in fear too long! Her hills

Shall have a spring of victory. Goodnight.

MARVEL: Goodnight.

ESSEX: And for this order, I received it not.

[He tears the paper]

CURTAIN

SCENE III.

The council hall of Act I is cleared here for a court assembly. Those who attended the council are present, save for Essex, also the Fool, Ellen, Mary, Tressa, Penelope, Bacon, and other Lords- and Ladies-in-Waiting. Burghley and Cecil are standing to one side in earnest talk. Across from them a group made up of Raleigh, Bacon, the Fool, and a number of others]

BURGHLEY: These players should be put down with an iron hand. They have neither conscience nor morals. They will make any display for money. In my young days they were allowed only interludes and instructive entertainment. The queen has been too lax . . .

CECIL: Have you seen this play of Richard II?

BURGHLEY: I see no plays.

CECIL: It's high treason. Richard is deposed in it. High treason.

BACON: Treason to depose a king? Not if you succeed.

CECIL: No, but treason to teach treason.

BACON: What is treason? RALEIGH: Said jesting Pilate.

CECIL: Is it not treason to depose a king? RALEIGH: What if it makes a king of you?

THE FOOL: It would then be treason not to have done it.

BACON: The Fool is a Jesuit.

THE FOOL: In truth, he was deposed. It is treason to all his successors to deny it.

BACON: An excellent Jesuit.

THE FOOL: What? I a Jesuit? Jesu!

PENELOPE: And a wit.

BACON: Bad.

PENELOPE: Very bad.

RALEIGH: Unutterably bad. What? Jesuit! Poisonous. Shall we allow this?

PENELOPE: I am guilty. I surrender.

RALEIGH: What did you do with the body? PENELOPE: There was none. I did eat my words.

RALEIGH: A cannibal, a monster, a word-swallower!

THE FOOL: A man-eater.

PENELOPE: Nay, nay!

BACON: Do you eat your men with butter or salt? PENELOPE: With salt if they are buttery and with butter if they are salty.

RALEIGH: Ready then. Here comes a salty man to be buttered.

PENELOPE: A butter-in. THE FOOL: A salt-butter.

BACON: A cheese . . . a whole cheese.

TRESSA: Full of holes, holey.

ELLEN: Pitted.

PENELOPE: What? Am I pitted against a cheese?
RALEIGH: Let but this cheese roll into your pit,
Lady . . . and you are answered.

PENELOPE: No . . . you are answered. You are answered no.

BURGHLEY: [To Cecil] There can be no doubt the Essex faction sent money to the actors to purchase a performance of Richard. It is an old play; it would draw no public.

CECIL: The actors are then accessory.

BURGHLEY: Think you so?

CECIL: They could hardly be unaware of the purposes of the Essex party.

BACON: It is so certain that Essex has a purpose? CECIL: He has led his army into London.

BACON: The men live in London. Moreover, the order to disperse on landing may not have been received. Such things have happened.

CECIL: Yes?

BACON: Aye, indeed.

CECIL: [To Burghley] You are to see these actors? BURGHLEY: They are sending spokesmen today.

THE FOOL: Let them put on the play for us.

TRESSA: Yes . . . the deposition scene. It may convince us. We may all turn rebel.

BURGHLEY: Tut!

THE FOOL: Tut? What does this mean . . . this tut?

BURGHLEY: Will you learn manners, sirrah? In my young days there was no such loose speaking about the court.

THE FOOL: There was no tutting, neither.

PENELOPE: You are mistaken. There used to be tutting parties. They all brought their tutting.

THE FOOL: Fie on you! Also pooh on you!

PENELOPE: Yes . . . there were fieing and poohing parties also.

RALEIGH: True, true. Well I remember the old days when all the young people would get together and try which could make the greatest pooh.

TRESSA: There was such laughter and jesting!

RALEIGH: Ah, yes, at the old Tut, Fie and Pooh Tavern! It's torn down now, but what a place it was!

THE FOOL: The game went out of fashion, alas, when it was discovered that a virgin could always pooh farther than anybody else.

TRESSA: Tut! MARY: Fie! ELLEN: Pooh!

THE FOOL: I beg pardon. I had forgotten there were virgins present.

PENELOPE: We are all virgins.

RALEIGH: The proof then, quickly. Show me. PENELOPE: It is nothing that can be seen, my lord.

RALEIGH: They say seeing is believing.

PENELOPE: Virginity is rather a state of mind.

ELLEN: Nay . . . a state of preservation.

THE FOOL: I have seen these preserved virgins.

RALEIGH: You have seen them?

THE FOOL: Seen them? I've been bothered by them. The whole court used to be driven indoors by them regularly on our progress through Middlesex.

RALEIGH: They are worse at night, I believe? Middlesex . . . Middlesex . . .

PENELOPE: Change the subject, gentles. This virginity begins to wear thin.

THE FOOL: It has worn clear through, and a great hole appears in the center.

PENELOPE: A hole in your wit.

RALEIGH: His Jesuit.

PENELOPE: His half-wit.

[A Herald enters and speaks to Cecil]

THE HERALD: My lord, there are two fellows here who ask for audience with the queen.

CECIL: Who are they? HERALD: Players, my lord.

CECIL: Tell them to wait. The queen will see them presently.

[The Herald goes out]

BURGHLEY: To my mind it was one of these same players writ the ballad that was posted up at St. Paul's.

CECIL: No, no . . . the man has been discovered . . . and will have his ears cropped for it.

BURGHLEY: But he could not have written it . . . he was but an instrument. The actors are too devilish ingenious at writing ballads. I cannot put it out of my mind they are all treasonous scoundrels.

RALEIGH: Is this the ballad on the Earl's return? CECIL: Aye . . . "When England needeth victories

She calleth Essex on . . ."

And more to the same purpose. What I cannot understand is that the queen should take no steps to put the city in a posture of defense. Essex draws near with his army . . . and we swing the gates as usual.

BACON: Is that a symptom of danger . . . that an English general should return with his army to the English capital?

CECIL: Are you not aware that Essex' house in the Strand is a camp brimming full of armed nobles going and coming?

THE FOOL: It is much more likely to be brimming with drunken nobles going and coming brim full.

CECIL: Be quiet!

THE FOOL: Fool, [Cecil lays a hand on his sword angrily. The Fool points to his own breast and repeats:] Fool.

[Cecil turns away. There is a rustling among those present. Several rise. At the rear the Queen appears silently, two Ladies following her. She comes forward without speaking, her eyes seeking for someone. She fixes on Lord Burghley]

THE QUEEN: Is it true, then, my dear Burghley, that you have taken to attending the Theatre?

BURGHLEY: No, madam.

THE QUEEN: It was not you, then, who forbade the performances of Richard II without asking my advice?

BURGHLEY: It was, madam. THE QUEEN: On what ground?

BURGHLEY: Your Majesty, the play is treasonous. It shows the deposition of a king, and its performance was procured by rebels.

THE QUEEN: Rebels? What rebels?

BURGHLEY: I know not, madam. I have sent for the players to discover that.

THE QUEEN: You have sent for them?

BURGHLEY: Aye, madam . . . and they are here. THE QUEEN: They will laugh at you, dear Burghey.

BURGHLEY: Others have laughed at me, Majesty. THE QUEEN: They will laugh at you, sir, and you will deserve it. Is my kingdom so shaky that we dare not listen to a true history? Are my people so easily led that the sight of a king deposed in play will send them running hither to pull the queen out of her chair? Have we not passion plays in every little town showing the murder of our Lord? You are nervous, Lord Burghley. Let these children play their plays.

CECIL: Your Majesty, I very much fear they are not children, and that they mean to do harm.

THE QUEEN: Then let them. Let them do all the harm they can. Are we too stupid to see that to prohibit a rebellious play is to proclaim our fear of rebellion? Who is there here who fears a rebellion against me? I do not.

CECIL: It is dangerous to let these mutterings grow, dear queen.

ELIZABETH: It is dangerous to touch them. Let them mutter, if they will. Let them cry out . . . let them run the streets, these children! When they have worn themselves weary running and crying "Up with Essex!" "Down with Elizabeth!" and got themselves drunk on mutual pledges, they will go to bed and sleep soundly and wake up wiser. Let me speak to these players. Bring them to me.

BURGHLEY: Here, madam?

ELIZABETH: Here.

CECIL: Majestas, adsunt legati de curia Galliæ. Placetne eos recipere antequam . . . 1

THE QUEEN: Cras illos recipiam. CECIL: Sed maxime præstat . . .

1 CECIL: Your Majesty, the French ambassadors are here. Would it please you to receive them before . . .

THE QUEEN: I will receive them tomorrow.

CECIL: But it is of the highest importance.

THE QUEEN: If it seems well to me, I will receive them when they come back tomorrow.

THE QUEEN: Si bene mihi videbitur, cras redituros reciniam!

Nay, I can bang you in Latin too!

[Cecil goes out. Elizabeth sits and turns to the Fool]

You, sirrah . . . I hear that you have fallen in love. Do you wish to be whipped?

THE FOOL: I would rather have been whipped, madam: much rather.

ELIZABETH: Why?

THE FOOL: It would hurt less.

ELIZABETH: Good. You shall be whipped.

THE FOOL: Madam, if you can whip it out of me I will give you my lucky shilling.

ELIZABETH: You shall be whipped and keep your shilling.

THE FOOL: You would better take it, madam queen.

ELIZABETH: Your shilling?

THE FOOL: Yes, madam queen, to buy another whip with for yourself. Nay, you had perhaps better buy several. But in truth, dear queen, I have not fallen in love, only a pretty little strumpet has fallen in love with me and I beg leave that we be allowed to marry.

ELIZABETH: Is she of the court?

THE FOOL: Yes, madam.

ELIZABETH: What, are there strumpets at court?

THE FOOL: Oh, they are all strumpets here at court. Some are here because they are strumpets and some are strumpets because they are here, but strumpets they all are.

ELIZABETH: Which is it you wish to marry?

THE FOOL: It is not that I wish to marry her, madam, but she wishes to marry me. [Walking about to choose, finally pointing to Tressa] This one, Majesty.

TRESSA: [Leaping at him] Scoundrel! . . .

THE FOOL: [Pointing to Ellen] No, no . . . I mean this one.

ELLEN: You dog! You . . .

[The Fool passes Penelope by]

THE FOOL: [Pointing to Mary] Or that one . . .

MARY: What!

THE FOOL: I feel sure it was one of them, Majesty . . . but it was dark at the time . . . and in truth I gave her my word of honor in the dark that I would make an honest woman of her by daylight. It is thus that most marriages are made.

ELIZABETH: How, fool?

THE FOOL: In the dark, my lady. Quite in the dark. ELIZABETH: [To a Soldier] Take this fool, captain, and put him in the dark for three days with but little bread and water. I have a distaste for this fooling.

THE FOOL: No, no, madam.

ELIZABETH: I am tired of your strumpets! And let him not see his lady Penelope meanwhile. You will be sure of that, mistress?

PENELOPE: I have no desire to see him. ELIZABETH: Whom do you desire to see?

PENELOPE: No one, your Majesty.

ELIZABETH: You lie! This Mistress Gray, take her too! Let her have bread and water!

[She looks at Penelope with hatred]

PENELOPE: Your Majesty . . . what is this?

ELIZABETH: I am weary to death of you! I am weary of all men and women, but more of you than any! You have written. You have had letters! I say, take her out of my sight! [The soldiers start to take out Penelope and the Fool] Whip them first, whip them both! [The two are taken to the door] Nay, leave them here, leave them, knaves . . . leave them! Damn you, do you hear me? You are too quick to obey orders! You like this whipping too well, sirrah! You have an itch for laying on! You beef-witted bastards! And now let us have entertainment, gentle lords! Let us be merry! The players are here! Let us have a play!

[A Herald runs in to the Queen without ceremony, calling out as he comes:]

THE HERALD: Your Majesty, Your Majesty! Lord Scroop sends me from the city to tell you there is a rising in London! There is a mob rising in the city!

ELIZABETH: What . . . is this one of the players? Are you playing Richard II for us?

THE HERALD: No, no, Your Majesty! A great number of people came through Fleet Street . . . and they have sacked a grocer's and broken into a wine-merchant's cellar! It is said they will break into Fleet Prison and set all free. . . .

ELIZABETH: Not they. If they've broken into a wine-cellar they'll get no farther. We're a marvellous people, we English, but we cannot hold liquor. Now if they were Scotch one might worry. What are they saying, these wine drinkers?

THE HERALD: I cannot tell you that, Your Majesty. ELIZABETH: Are they not crying "Up with Essex!" "Down with Elizabeth!"?

THE HERALD: Yes, madam!

ELIZABETH: Why surely. What else would they be crying? "Up with Essex!" Viva! "Down with Elizabeth!" A bas! The queen is dead, long live the king! If I were there I would cry it myself! It has a marvellous ring! "Up with Essex!" "Down with Elizabeth!"

BURGHLEY: What are we to do, madam?

ELIZABETH: [To the Herald] What is the Lord Mayor doing about this?

THE HERALD: Nothing, Madam.

ELIZABETH: How like a Lord Mayor and how sensible. That's the first principle of government. Never do anything. Let the others make all the mistakes.

CECIL: But madam . . . there are five hundred of the royal guard at the Tower. . . .

ELIZABETH: Let the mayor of London look out for his people. If he allows them to run up and down breaking into wine-cellars, it's his own affair.

BURGHLEY: But if it spreads to the palace, Majesty?

ELIZABETH: Why yes . . . let them bring their revolution here to me. I should be amused to see it. They are children, Burghley, drunken children. Would you fire on children?

BURGHLEY: Then let me go into London, madam

ELIZABETH: And call out the guard and put down these traitors with powder and ball? No! They are to be allowed to get quite drunk and then go to sleep. Where are these players?

[Cecil enters with Burbage and Hemmings] CECIL: Here, madam.

ELIZABETH: Ah, yes, bold Burbage and handsome Hemmings. Well, my masters, I understand that you have come to me to have your noses slit and your thumbs branded? Is it so?

BURBAGE: Only if unavoidable, Your Majesty. ELIZABETH: You have put on a play, I believe?

BURBAGE: Many, Your Majesty.

ELIZABETH: You have revived the old play of Richard II, including in it the deposition scene which was censored on its first presentation, and you have done this to foster treasonous projects.

BURBAGE: No, Your Majesty, I swear it. ELIZABETH: You have not played this play?

BURBAGE: But not to foster treason, that I swear. ELIZABETH: If you played Richard with that potbelly it was treason indeed. Then for what purpose?

BURBAGE: To make money. ELIZABETH: On an old play?

BURBAGE: We were paid in advance . . .

ELIZABETH: By whom?

BURBAGE: By Lord Southampton.

BURGHLEY: You see? A friend of Essex.

ELIZABETH: You have much too handsome a nose for slitting, Master Hemmings, yet you say nothing. HEMMINGS: There is only this to say, Your Majesty... that we knew nothing of any traitorous intent in the matter... and that, had we known of such intent, we would not have given the performance.

ELIZABETH: I think you are all traitorous knaves and rascals, as a matter of fact, in league with Essex and Southampton—and the smoothest liars in Christendom. Is there something in this?

HEMMINGS: No, madam.

ELIZABETH: You know Essex and Southampton? HEMMINGS: We know Lord Southampton.

ELIZABETH: How much were you paid for the revival of Richard?

HEMMINGS: Three pounds, Your Majesty.

ELIZABETH: No more? HEMMINGS: No more.

ELIZABETH: Play it again this afternoon, masters, play it at my request this afternoon, and you shall have ten pounds for it. Lord Cecil, pay Master Burbage ten pounds from the royal exchequer for one performance of Richard. And let it stand in the record.

CECIL: Yes, madam.

ELIZABETH: [To Hemmings] And tell Lord Southampton when you see him that I paid ten to his three. Will you tell him?

HEMMINGS: Yes, Your Majesty.

ELIZABETH: And when you have all this treason out of your systems be ready to play Sir John Falstaff for me at the end of the week. I should like to see your Falstaff again, sir.

BURBAGE: Yes, Your Majesty.

ELIZABETH: You may go.

[Burbage and Hemmings go out]

CECIL: [Waiting till they are gone] You are mad. Your Majesty! This is a rebellion, and you play into their hands. The outer court is thronging with messengers from the city! Half the town is in uprising!

ELIZABETH: I know.

CECIL: Madam . . .

ELIZABETH: Little man, little man, let me alone. CECIL: This much I must tell you. Lord Essex has been seen with an armed force in the city.

ELIZABETH: Lord Essex?

CECIL: With an army. Where he is now no one can say.

ELIZABETH: And if one were to guess?

CECIL: He is on his way hither.

ELIZABETH: So I think. I shall be glad to see him. Let him bring his revolution here. How long think you it will last after I have looked on it?

BURGHLEY: Madam, the palace is unprotected from the waterside. The guard must be drawn up.

ELIZABETH: With your permission, my lord, I would rather not.

CECIL: I took the liberty of ordering a guard posted along the river.

[A door is opened without and a sudden snarl of angry voices breaks in on the conference] THE VOICES: "Who has given these orders?"

"Back there . . . back!"

"Not the queen, by God!"

"The queen . . . the queen! Defend the queen!"
"An Essex!"

"Hold your mouth!"

"Stand back, fellow!"

ESSEX: [Outside] I say the queen will see me! Stand back!

[There is a clank of armor in the hallway and Essex appears in the doorway, Soldiers following him]

ELIZABETH: You come with a file of soldiers at your back, my lord of Essex.

ESSEX: Do I need them, Your Majesty?

ELIZABETH: No.

ESSEX: Then be off with you. Follow my orders. [Soldiers go out] They told me you would not see me.

ELIZABETH: They were wrong. I will see you. It seems you are in rebellion,

My good lord. Enter and state your grievance, If you have grievance. For myself, I have A great affection for rebels, being one myself Much of the time. ESSEX: I am no rebel, Your Majesty . . .

But, newly arrived from Ireland, and bearing news Of your subjects there, I venture to come to see you, No more.

ELIZABETH: And your army? . . . You have an army with you?

ESSEX: I have brought my men home to London. ELIZABETH: You received

My orders, no doubt, directing you to disband? ESSEX: I believed them to be mistaken. To disband on the coast

And leave my expedition there, seemed strange, And dangerous to the country. An army turned Becomes a mob.

ELIZABETH: And you tell me this! You are informed in these matters

But I am not!

ESSEX: Indeed, that is quite true . . .

I do know about armies . . . and you do not. ELIZABETH: Oh, yes . . .

Oh, indeed. And who paid them then? I believe

Your supplies were cut off? ESSEX: I have paid them. ELIZABETH: They are then In your service?

ESSEX: In my service and therefore Devoted yours.

ELIZABETH: And Ireland? How of Ireland? ESSEX: I could have conquered Ireland had you given me time.

I left it worse than I found it. ELIZABETH: An honest answer,

At any rate.

ESSEX: Why should I lie? The fault,

If any, was yours. To conquer Ireland requires

More than the months you gave me. Years, perhaps. ELIZABETH: You were engaged in subduing the rebels, then,

When I summoned you home?

essex: Just so.

ELIZABETH: You were not, by chance,

Joined with the rebels? essex: Never.

ELIZABETH: You held no parleys

With our friend Tyrone?

ESSEX: I did. They were part of my plan.

ELIZABETH: Your plans! Your plans! Why did you write me nothing

Of these your plans? Am I a witch to find out What happens on the far side of the Irish Sea

Without being told?

ESSEX: I wrote vou . . . ELIZABETH: Masterly letters.

Brief, to the point, wasting no words, in short,

Nothing.

ESSEX: I know not what Your Majesty means

By that. I wrote you fully, and in answer Received no reply.

ELIZABETH: You wrote me?

ESSEX: Many times.

ELIZABETH: And had no letters from me?

essex: None.

ELIZABETH: Before God.

If the couriers were tampered with there shall be Some necks stretched here! My lords, I wish to

With Lord Essex here alone! Leave us.

CECIL: Dear queen, Do you think it safe . . .

ELIZABETH: Leave us!

[Burghley makes a sign and the stage is silently emptied save for the Queen and Essex. A pause]

What did you write me?

ESSEX: I wrote you my love-for I thought you loved me then-

And then I pled with you not to bring me home In the midst of my mission—and then at last angrily-

For I had not heard—but always to say I loved you-Always.

ELIZABETH: But is this true? ESSEX: Would I lie? ELIZABETH: Some one

Has lied and will pay with his life if this is true!-Before God and hell-some one will pay for this.

ESSEX: What did you write me? ELIZABETH: I wrote-my love-

God keep you safe—I know not—and then, not hearing.

I wrote God knows what madness—as to a rebel-

Thinking you no longer mine—faithless!

Thinking-

ESSEX: I would I had known-I was in torment-I-forgive me-

ELIZABETH: You should never have gone away.

God, how I've hated you!-

ESSEX: No!

ELIZABETH: Planned to put you to torture!

ESSEX: I have been in torture! [He steps toward her]

ELIZABETH: Not yet-I can't breathe yet-I can't breathe-

Or think or believe-

ESSEX: Nor I.

ELIZABETH: Can we ever-

Believe again? Can it be as it used to be?

ESSEX: We can make it so.

ELIZABETH: Come, kill me if you will. Put your arms round me-

If you love me. Do you still love me?

essex: Yes.

ELIZABETH: Yes, yes-

If this were false, then, then truly—then I should

I thought because I was older—you see—some one else——

ESSEX: No one—never a breath—

ELIZABETH: Is it all, all as before?

ESSEX: We have not changed.

ELIZABETH: No. Yes, a little, perhaps. They have changed us a little.

ESSEX: Not I. I have not changed. ELIZABETH: Can I trust you now?

ESSEX: Sweet, think back, all those months,

All those hideous months! No word, no love. And then word did come, it was to make me prisoner!

Christ, I have pride!

And though I came here in defiance, I came truly to find you

Who have been lost from me.

ELIZABETH: Do you ask forgiveness?

It is all forgiven.

ESSEX: Then, why then, hell's vanished—

And here's heaven risen out of it, a heaven of years In the midst of desolate centuries.

ELIZABETH: We have so few years.

Let us make them doubly sweet, these years we have, Be gracious with each other, sway a little

To left or right if we must to stay together—

Never distrust each other—nay, distrust

All others, when they whisper. Let us make this our pact

Now, for the fates are desperate to part us And the very gods envy this happiness We pluck out of loss and death.

essex: If two stand shoulder to shoulder against the gods,

Happy together, the gods themselves are helpless Against them, while they stand so.

ELIZABETH: Love, I will be

Your servant. Command me. What would you have? ESSEX: Why nothing——

ELIZABETH: Take this my world, my present in your hands!

You shall stand back of my chair and together we Shall build an England to make the old world wonder And the new world worship!—What is this doubt in your brow?

ESSEX: I am troubled to be dishonest. I have brought my army

Here to the palace—and though it's all true that we've said——

No letters—utter agony over long months—— It is something in myself that has made me do this, Not Cecil—nor anyone. No one but myself. The rest is all excuse.

ELIZABETH: Speak what you will.

essex: If you had but shown anger I could have spoken

Easily. It's not easy now, but speak I must!

Oh, I've thought much about this
On lonely marches and in distant tents,
Thinking of you and me. I say this now
Without rancor—in all friendliness and love——
The throne is yours by right of descent and by Possession—but if this were a freer time,
And there were election, I should carry the country before me,

And this being true, and we being equal in love, Should we not be equal in power as well?

ELIZABETH: We are equal.

I have made you so.

ESSEX: Yes, but still it's all yours——Yours to grant me now or take away.

ELIZABETH: How could this well be otherwise? ESSEX: Am I not—and I say this too in all love—

As worthy to be king as you to be queen?

Must you be sovereign alone?

ELIZABETH: You are young in policy, My Essex, if you do not see that if I Should grant high place to you now it would show ill to the kingdom——

It would be believed that you had forced this on me, Would be called a revolution. It would undermine All confidence. What is built up for years In people's minds blows away like thistledown When such things get abroad.

ESSEX: But is this your reason

Or have you another? Would you trust me as king? ELIZABETH: No.

ESSEX: And are you still reluctant to give up Your prerogatives?

ELIZABETH: Yes.

ESSEX: Then now, when the country is mine, the court in my hands,

You my prisoner, I must send my men away, Disband my army, give back your kingdom to you, And know I have been king for a moment only And never will be again?

ELIZABETH: I am your prisoner?

ESSEX: The palace and the city are in my hands. This England is mine now for the taking—— ELIZABETH: This is your friendship! This is your love!

ESSEX: As water finds its level, so power goes To him who can use it, and soon or late the name Of king follows where power is.

ELIZABETH: Oh, my Essex,

You are a child in war as you are in council.

Why all this talk of power? No army opposed you

When your troops came the road from Ireland.

No guard was set

To stop your entrance with your thousand halberds. Shall I tell you why? Because I wished to keep A semblance of peace between us. And for that, I am your prisoner!

ESSEX: Yes. My dear prisoner.

ELIZABETH: Now I do know at least
What it was you wanted. You wanted my kingdom.
You have it.

Make the best of it. And so shall I.

What are your plans?

ESSEX: I have none.

ELIZABETH: The Tower, the block—

You could hardly take a queen prisoner and have no thought

Of her destiny. I am my mother's daughter,

I too can walk the path my mother walked.

ESSEX: These are heroics. You know you are free as air.

ELIZABETH: If I do as you ask.

ESSEX: Is it so hard to share your power with your love?

I could have all—and I offer to share with you.

ELIZABETH: Let's have no more pretending.

I'd have given all—but you came with an army, demanding——

In short, you don't love—nor trust me—no—nor want me——

ESSEX: God knows I have wanted you. I have wanted power——

Believed myself fitted to hold it—but not without vou.

ELIZABETH: If you had wanted me would you rise and strike

At me with an army? Never, never! You'd have come

To me quietly, and we'd have talked of it together As lovers should—and we'd both have our way——And no one the wiser. But now, to take the palace, Hold me prisoner—no—what you wanted you've taken——

And that is all you shall have. This is your king-dom—

But I—I am not yours.

essex: But I am yours

And have been.

ELIZABETH: Who will believe that? Not the world, No, and not I. I'd rather go to the Tower

Than share my place on terms like these.

Put me where I

Will do least harm.

ESSEX: I cannot, could not, will not.

ELIZABETH: If I could have given freely-

But not now. Not surrendering. Not to a victor.

ESSEX: I am no victor if I lose you. The only gift

That I could take from you is that we are equals. ELIZABETH: Yes, but not now.

ESSEX: I ask one word from you.

Give me this word—this one word—and these soldiers

Shall leave, and you shall be free.

ELIZABETH: I'll believe that

When it happens.

ESSEX: I'll believe you when you promise.

ELIZABETH: Then you have my promise.

You shall share the realm with me. As I am queen, I promise it.

promise it.

essex: Then this is my answer.

[He kisses her, then calls:]

Marvel!--Marvel!

[Marvel enters]

Carry out the order of release. Dismiss my Return the palace into the queen's hands.

Retire with all our forces to the Strand.

Release all prisoners. Release the queen's guard

And send them to their stations.

[Marvel goes out]

The palace will be Returned as quickly as taken. This is our last quarrel.

ELIZABETH: Yes-our last.

MARVEL'S VOICE: [Off-stage] Form for retire!

ANOTHER VOICE: Form for retire!

A MORE DISTANT VOICE: Form for retire!

A VOICE: [In the distance] Ready to march!

ANOTHER VOICE: Ready to march!

ANOTHER: All ready!

ANOTHER: Ready, captain!

[Marvel enters]

MARVEL: The order is obeyed, my lord.

essex: Follow your men.

MARVEL: Yes, my lord. [He goes out]

ESSEX: It is as I planned. They are leaving the palace.

Now let us talk no more of this tonight——

Let us forget this matter of thrones and kingdoms And be but you and me for a while.

ELIZABETH: [Immobile] Yes—yes—

Let us forget. Have you kept your word indeed?

essex: I have kept my word.

ELIZABETH: If I clapped my hands Would my guard come now—or yours?

essex: Yours only. Shall I call them?

ELIZABETH: No—I'll call them. [She claps her hands four times. Captain Armin appears in the entrance followed by four Beef-eaters with halberds.

They stand at attention in the entrance]

To be sure I have a guard

Once more. [To the Captain]

The palace has been returned? It is in Our hands?

CAPTAIN: Yes, Majesty.

ELIZABETH: I have ruled England a long time, my Essex,

And I have found that he who would rule must be Ouite friendless, without mercy, without love.

Arrest Lord Essex!

Arrest Lord Essex! Take him to the Tower

And keep him safe.

ESSEX: Is this a jest?

ELIZABETH: I never

Jest when I play for kingdoms, my lord of Essex.

ESSEX: I trusted you.

ELIZABETH: I trusted you,

And learned from you that no one can be trusted.

I will remember that.

ESSEX: Lest that should be all

You ever have to remember, Your Majesty,

Take care what you do.

ELIZABETH: I shall take care.

[Essex unsheathes his sword, breaks it across his knee, flings it at the foot of the throne, turns and walks out between the two files of guards]

CURTAIN

ACT III.

The queen's apartments in the Tower, a square and heavy room, long and with a raised stone platform, at one end of which stands a regal chair. It is dawn, the light filtering in coldly. Ellen stands in the doorway at the left, weeping, with one arm before her face. The Fool, who has been sleeping wrapped in the draperies of the queen's chair, uncoils himself from among them and rolls over to rub his eyes.
Tressa hurries in.

TRESSA: Come back quickly, dear, quickly! She's sorry she hurt you. She'll have no one else read to her.

ELLEN: [Weeping] I can't read now. I'm—I don't mind if she strikes me—only—it wasn't my fault —— We're all so weary.

TRESSA: She's sorry—

THE FOOL: [Waking] One, two—there should be three.

[Mary comes to the door] MARY: [Very low] Ellen—

THE FOOL: Three.

MARY: Ellen! She wants you at once.

[Ellen runs out]
THE FOOL: Where am I?

MARY: Yes-and what are you doing there?

THE FOOL: Trying to sleep. MARY: Sleep? In the Tower?

THE FOOL: Come and help me. I have heard that you are perfect at lying down. [Mary and Tressa go out. The Fool looks about him sleepily, then remembers something and hunts for it under a chair. When he extracts it it proves to be a roasted bird on a wooden platter, covered with leaves. He examines it, then replaces a large leaf over it. Penelope, fully dressed, comes in from the rear] Penelope?

PENELOPE: Yes?

THE FOOL: Have you slept?

PENELOPE: No.

THE FOOL: Then you should break your fast. You are hungry?

PENELOPE: No. I can't eat.

THE FOOL: [Showing his capon] Look.

PENELOPE: What's that?

THE FOOL: Breakfast. I brought it from Whitehall.

PENELOPE: Eat it then.

[She sits on a step disconsolately] THE FOOL: You won't have any?

PENELOPE: No.

THE FOOL: [Pushing the food away] I'm not hungry either.

PENELOPE: Eat it, poor fool.

THE FOOL: I don't want it. I brought it for you.

PENELOPE: I know. But eat it.

[She wipes her eyes]

THE FOOL: Why should you weep?

PENELOPE: God knows. He never wept for me. THE FOOL: The earl's not dead yet, remember.

PENELOPE: No.

THE FOOL: And she'll never let it happen.

PENELOPE: The clock's struck five. He's to die at six.

THE FOOL: Why has she not sent to him?

PENELOPE: She has. We were awake all night. She has sent messages but he's not answered. She's been waiting for word from him. But he's as silent as if he wanted to die.

THE FOOL: Will she let them kill him if he says nothing?

PENELOPE: She's a strange woman. She wants him to beg her pardon . . . or something like that.

THE FOOL: Would you beg her pardon if you were he?

PENELOPE: No.

THE FOOL: Then he won't. For I think he's as proud as you.

PENELOPE: He has not said a word or sent a message since his arrest.

THE FOOL: And the queen has not slept?

PENELOPE: No. THE FOOL: Nor you? PENELOPE: No.

THE FOOL: God help these women.

PENELOPE: She says she gave him a ring onee. If he ever wanted forgiveness he was to send the ring. And he sits there stubbornly with the ring on his finger. Oh, God, will nothing happen?

[The Fool has absent-mindedly pulled the capon toward him again, and begins to eat. Elizabeth emerges from the rear]

ELIZABETH: Penelope?

PENELOPE: Yes.

ELIZABETH: Have the players come?

PENELOPE: Not yet.

[The Fool has pushed the food guiltily behind him]

ELIZABETH: These cheating grooms! I'll have them carbonadoed for this dallying! I shall go mad here! Bring me the little book of prayers . . . from the window-sill. No . . . leave it. The gods of men are sillier than their kings and queens . . . and emptier and more powerless. There is no god but death, no god but death! [She sees the food the Fool has been hiding] Gnaw your bones somewhere else!

[The Fool goes out left] Come here, my dear. I THE FOOL: Yes, madam. [He tries to eat] heard the clock strike five. ELIZABETH: Now wipe your fingers. Here, take my napkin, child. Come here! PENELOPE: Yes. I heard it. They sit together on the steps, and Penelope You're disgusting! puts her arm round Elizabeth] [She gives him a kerchief] ELIZABETH: Do you love him well, my dear? Can you not clean your face? THE FOOL: With this? PENELOPE: Yes, Your Majesty. [Elizabeth bows her head wearily on Penelope] ELIZABETH: Aye, with that. [She takes his bone and throws it] ELIZABETH: I love him. He has never loved me. PENELOPE: Yes, yes. He does love you. I've been Why do you make mouths at it? It's clean. THE FOOL: Yes, madam! madly jealous of you. [He begins to wipe his mouth, then starts to ELIZABETH: Of me? Poor child. PENELOPE: But he loved you . . . and never me cry; and, sitting down on the steps, sobs heavily, his head in his hands] at all. ELIZABETH: How do you know? ELIZABETH: What is it now? What good's a fool PENELOPE: He told me. that cries ELIZABETH: What did he say? When you need comfort? What's the matter? PENELOPE: He said, "I love her dearly." I wanted THE FOOL: Please. I don't know. You aren't like the queen. him for myself, and I warned him against you. He laughed at me. He said, "I love her very dearly." ELIZABETH: I am The queen, though. ELIZABETH: You tell me this because you want to TRESSA: [Looking in] The players, madam. ELIZABETH: Bring them here. PENELOPE: No. dear queen. It's true. PENELOPE: The time's grown short. Will you send ELIZABETH: This is the end of me, dear. This is ELIZABETH: Wait . . . he may come. It comes late. I've been a long while learning, PENELOPE: No, no. He won't. You'll let it go too But I've learned it now. Life is bitter. Nobody long Dies happy, queen or no. Will he speak, think you? Watching the players. Will he send to me? ELIZABETH: Let them come in. PENELOPE: No. Not now. [Tressa is seen at the doorway with the Actors] ELIZABETH: You see, PENELOPE: You should eat This is the end of me. Oh, I shall live. A little something first. I shall walk about and give orders . . . a horrible ELIZABETH: No, no. Bring them in. while . . . [The Actors enter] A horrible old hag. Come in, my masters, let us have a play . . . PENELOPE: You must send for him. Let us have revels and amusements He's proud as you are, and you have the upper hand. He'll say nothing. You must send for him, bring him quickly . . . If ever you played play now. This is my bad here. Quarter of an hour. [The chimes ring the quarter hour] PENELOPE: Please, please . . . ELIZABETH: Not yet. Not yet. [She rises] Where are the players? I sent ELIZABETH: Quick! Quick . . . For the players hours ago! They shall pay for this, You are late, sirs . . . never mind . . . some scene from Falstaff . . . The insolent servants! Mary . . . Tressa, God's The one where he lies to the prince about running head! I'm bestially served! Ellen! [Ellen looks in, partly dressed] And the prince catches him . . . HEMMINGS: Where, Majesty? Find out if the players Are here? And be quick. ELIZABETH: There, anywhere. Come, sit down. Sit ELLEN: Yes, madam. [She disappears] [The Girls and the Fool group about her]

ELIZABETH: Where's my fool?

THE FOOL: [Looking in with a bone in his hand] Here, madam.

ELIZABETH: Where are you when I need you? Look at the oaf! Say nothing! You're funny enough The way you are with your capon in your mouth! Eat! Eat! Let me see you!

THE FOOL: I don't seem to be hungry!

ELIZABETH: Eat, I say!

FALSTAFF: I call thee coward! I'll see thee damned ere I call thee coward: but I would give a thousand pound I could run as fast as thou canst.

Begin, Falstaff! "I call thee coward! I'll see thee

PRINCE HENRY: What's the matter?

Damned ere I call thee coward!"

FALSTAFF: What's the matter! there be four of us here have ta'en a thousand pound this day morning. PRINCE HENRY: Where is it, Jack? where is it?
FALSTAFF: Where is it! taken from us it is: a hundred upon poor four of us.

PRINCE HENRY: What, fought ye with them all?
FALSTAFF: All! I know not what ye call all; but if I fought not with fifty of them, I am a bunch of radish: if there were not two or three and fifty upon poor old Jack, then am I no two-legged creature.

ELIZABETH: Come, come . . . this is not to the purpose . . . I had thought this witty . . . [The Players pause] Play! Play!

PRINCE HENRY: Pray God, you have not murdered some of them.

FALSTAFF: Nay, that's past praying for: I have peppered two of them; two I am sure I have paid, ... two rogues in buckram suits. I tell thee what, Hal, ... if I tell thee a lie, spit in my face, call me horse. Thou knowest my old ward ... here I lay, and thus I bore my point. Four rogues in buckram let drive at me ...

PRINCE HENRY: What, four? thou saidst but two even now.

FALSTAFF: Four, Hal; I told thee four.

POINS: Ay, ay, he said four.

FALSTAFF: These four came all a-front, and mainly thrust at me. I made me no more ado but took all their seven points in my target, thus.

[The Queen walks from place to place, rest-

PRINCE HENRY: Seven? why, there were but four even now.

FALSTAFF: In buckram?

POINS: Aye, four in buckram suits.

FALSTAFF: Seven, by these hilts, or I am a villain else.

PRINCE HENRY: Pr'ythee, let him alone; we shall have more anon.

FALSTAFF: Dost thou hear me, Hal?

PRINCE HENRY: Ay, and mark thee too, Jack.

ELIZABETH: Aye, aye . . . we are listening . . . Play!

FALSTAFF: Do so, for it is worth the listening to. These nine in buckram that I told thee of . . .

PRINCE HENRY: So, two more already.

FALSTAFF: Began to give me ground: but I followed me close, came in foot and hand; and with a thought seven of the eleven I paid.

PRINCE HENRY: O monstrous! eleven buckram men grown out of two!

FALSTAFF: But, as the devil would have it, three misbegotten knaves in Kendal green came at my back and let drive at me . . . for it was so dark, Hal, that thou couldst not see thy hand.

PRINCE HENRY: These lies are like the father that begets them . . . gross as a mountain, open, palpable. Why, thou clay-brained guts, thou knottypated fool, thou whoreson, obscene, greasy tallow-ketch . . .

FALSTAFF: What, art thou mad? art thou mad? is not the truth the truth?

PRINCE HENRY: Why, how couldst thou know these men in Kendal green, when it was so dark thou couldst not see thy hand? come, tell us your reason: what sayest thou to this?

POINS: Come, your reason, Jack . . . your reason.

FALSTAFF: What, upon compulsion? Give you a reason on compulsion! if reasons were as plenty as blackberries I would give no man a reason on compulsion, I.

PRINCE HENRY: I'll be no longer guilty of this sin; this sanguine coward, this bed-presser, this horse back-breaker, this huge hill of flesh . . .

FALSTAFF: Away, you starveling, you elfskin, you dried neat's tongue . . . O for breath to utter what is like thee! . . . you tailor's yard, you sheath, you bowcase, you vile standing-tuck . . .

PRINCE HENRY: Well, breathe awhile, and then to it again: and when thou hast tired thyself in base comparisons, hear me speak but this.

POINS: Mark, Jack.

PRINCE HENRY: We two saw you four set on four; you bound them, and were masters of their wealth.

... Mark now, how a plain tale shall put you down.

... Then did we two set on you four; and, with a word, outfaced you from your prize, and have it: yes, and can show it you here in the house:

... and, Falstaff, you carried your guts away as nimbly, with as quick dexterity, and roared for mercy, and still ran and roared, as ever I heard bull-calf. What a slave art thou, to hack thy sword as thou hast done, and then say it was in fight! What trick, what device, what starting-hole canst thou now find out to hide thee from this open and apparent shame?

POINS: Come, let's hear, Jack; what trick hast thou now?

FALSTAFF: By the Lord, I knew ye as well as He that made ye. Why, hear ye, my masters: was it for me to kill the heir-apparent? Should I turn upon the true prince? Why, thou knowest I am as valiant as Hercules: but beware instinct; the lion will not touch the true prince. Instinct is a great matter; I was a coward on instinct. I shall think the better of myself and thee during my life; I for a valiant lion, and thou for a true prince. But, by the Lord, lads, I am glad you have the money. What, shall we be merry? Shall we have a play extempore?

ELIZABETH: My God, my God . . . can not one forget for a moment?

Who are these strangers? What is this interlude? Go! Go! It's a vile play and you play it vilely! Go! By my God, will no one deliver me from this torment? [The Players start out]

Take your trappings and go!

[They leave. The chimes strike]

Again . . . the half-hour . . . [Cecil enters]

Yes? [To Penelope]

Was I not wise to wait? He has spoken first! Yes?

CECIL: Your Majesty, a citizen rabble has gathered To protest the execution of Essex. The captain Begs permission to use your guard. There's no other Force at hand to disperse them. ELIZABETH: It's your day, Cecil. I daresay you know that. The snake-in-the-grass Endures, and those who are noble, free of soul, Valiant and admirable . . . they go down in the prime, Always they go down . . . CECIL: Madam, the guard Is needed at once . . . ELIZABETH: Aye . . . the snake-mind is best . . . One by one you out-last them. To the end Of time it will be so . . . the rats inherit the earth. Take my guard. Take it. I thought you brought word from . . . Go, call Lord Essex for me From his cell . . . and bring him hither! I'll wait no longer! CECIL: Lord Essex is prepared for execution. The priest has been sent to him. ELIZABETH: Bring him here, I say, And now . . . at once! [Cecil bows and goes out] Go out from me, all of you, All save Penelope. Go quickly, quickly . . . All . . . [They leave] Penelope, bring my robe, the one Laid out . . . [Penelope goes. Elizabeth seats herself in the royal chair. Penelope returns with the robe] Look here in my face, Penelope. He's so young, And I'm old, girl, I'm old. It shows in my eyes. Dear, you're so young. Do not be here when he comes . . Do you mind? You'll look so young. PENELOPE: Yes, madam . . . but you . . . You're beautiful. ELIZABETH: Beautiful still? But I was once . . . I was . . . You'd not believe it now. PENELOPE: Oh, yes . You're always beautiful. You've always been. ELIZABETH: Thank you, My dear. Go now. He'll come. PENELOPE: Yes. [She goes out to the rear. After a moment Essex enters from the left with a Guard. The Guard leaves him and steps out. Essex is dressed in black and is very pale] ESSEX: You sent for me? Or so they said. ELIZABETH: Yes. ESSEX: It would have been kinder To leave me with my thoughts till the axe came And ended them. You spoil me for death. ELIZABETH: Are you

So set on dying?

ESSEX: I can't say I care for it. This blood that beats in us has a way of wanting To keep right on. But if one is to die It's well to go straight toward it. ELIZABETH: You must have known I never meant you to die. ESSEX: I am under sentence From Your Majesty's courts. There's no appeal that I know of. I am found guilty of treason on good evidence, And cannot deny it. This treason, I believe, Is punishable with death. ELIZABETH: God knows I am proud . . . And bitter, too . . . bitter at you with much cause, But I have sent for you. I've taken the first step That way. Do not make me take the next! ESSEX: The next is to the scaffold. It's only a step Now, and I've made ready. ELIZABETH: Aye, you are bitter, Too; we have let it go late; we've both Waited for the other. But it was I who spoke First . . . Will you make me tell you first how much I've longed for you? It's hard for me. ESSEX: My dear, You can tell me so gracefully, for you Have nothing to gain or lose by me . . . but I Have life and love to gain, and I find it less Than fitting to speak like a lover, lest you suppose I do it to save my head. ELIZABETH: It's true that you never Loved me, isn't it? You were ambitious, and I Loved you, and it was the nearest way to power, And you took the nearest way? No, no . . . one moment . . . This is an hour for truth, if there's ever truth . . I'm older than you . . . but a queen; it was natural You'd flatter me, speak me fair, and I believed you. I'm sorry I believed you. Sorry for you More than for me. ESSEX: Why, yes . . . that's true enough. Now may I go? This dying sticks in my mind, And makes me poor company, I fear. ELIZABETH: It was true. It was true then? ESSEX: If you wish to make me tell you What you well know, how much I used to love you, How much I have longed for you, very well, I will sav it. That's a small victory to win over me now, But take it with the rest. ELIZABETH: You did love me? ESSEX: Yes. ELIZABETH: And love me still? essex: Yes. You should know that, I think. ELIZABETH: You kept my ring. You never sent I've been waiting for it. ESSEX: You may have it back.

If you have use for it . . . I had thought to wear it As far as my grave, but, take it.

ELIZABETH: I'd have forgiven

All that had passed, at any hour, day or night, Since I last saw you. I have waited late at night Thinking, tonight the ring will come, he will never Hold out against me so long, but the nights went by Somehow, like the days, and it never came,

Till the last day came, and here it is the last morning And the chimes beating out the hours.

ESSEX: Dear, if I'd known . . .

But I could not have sent it.

ELIZABETH: Why? ESSEX: If I'd tried

To hold you to a promise you could not keep And you had refused me, I should have died much Unhappy than I am now.

ELIZABETH: I'd have kept my promise.

I'd keep it now.

ESSEX: If I offered you this ring? ELIZABETH: Yes . . . even now.

ESSEX: You would pardon me, set me free Cede back my estates to me, love me as before,

Give me my place in the state? ELIZABETH: All as it was.

ESSEX: And what would happen to your throne?

ELIZABETH: My throne?

ESSEX: Yes, for I'd take it from you.

ELIZABETH: Again? You'd play that game again?

ESSEX: The games one plays

Are not the games one chooses always. I Am still a popular idol of a sort.

There are mutterings over my imprisonment, Even as it is . . . and if you should set me free And confess your weakness by overlooking treason And setting me up in power once more, the storm That broke last time would be nothing to the storm That would break over you then. As for myself, I played for power and lost, but if I had Another chance I think I'd play and win.

ELIZABETH: Why do you say this?

ESSEX: I say it because it's true. I have loved you, love you now, but I know myself.

If I were to win you over and take my place As it used to be, it would gall me. I have a weakness For being first wherever I am. I refuse To take pardon from you without warning you Of this. And when you know it, pardon becomes Impossible.

ELIZABETH: You do this for me?

ESSEX: Why, yes,

But not altogether. Partly for England, too. I've lost conceit of myself a little. A life In prison's very quiet. It leads to thinking. You govern England better than I should. I'd lead her into wars, make a great name, Perhaps, like Henry Fifth and leave a legacy

Of debts and bloodshed after me. You will leave Peace, happiness, something secure. A woman gov-

Better than a man, being a natural coward.

A coward rules best.

ELIZABETH: Still bitter.

essex: Perhaps a little.

It's a bitter belief to swallow, but I believe it.

You were right all the time.

[The chimes ring three-quarters]

And now, if you'll pardon me,

I have an appointment near-by with a headsman.

He comes sharp on the hour.

ELIZABETH: You have an hour yet.

It's but struck five.

ESSEX: It struck five some time since.

ELIZABETH: It cannot go this way!

essex: Aye, but it has.

It has and will. There's no way out. I've thought of Every way. Speak frankly. Could you forgive me And keep your throne?

ELIZABETH: No.

essex: Are you ready to give

Your crown up to me?

ELIZABETH: No. It's all I have. [She rises]

Why, who am I

To stand here paltering with a rebel noble!

I am Elizabeth, daughter of a king,

The queen of England, and you are my subject! What does this mean, you standing here eye to eye With me, your liege? You whom I made, and gave All that you have, you, an upstart, defying Me to grant pardon, lest you should sweep me from

And take my place from me? I tell you if Christ his blood

Ran streaming from the heavens for a sign That I should hold my hand you'd die for this, You pretender to a throne upon which you have No claim, you pretender to a heart, who have been Hollow and heartless and faithless to the end!

ESSEX: If we'd met some other how we might have been happy . . .

But there's been an empire between us! I am to die . . .

Let us say that . . . let us begin with that . . . For then I can tell you that if there'd been no empire We could have been great lovers. If even now You were not queen and I were not pretender, That god who searches heaven and earth and hell For two who are perfect lovers, could end his search With you and me. Remember . . . I am to die . . . And so I can tell you truly, out of all the earth That I'm to leave, there's nothing I'm very loath To leave save you. Yet if I live I'll be Your death or you'll be mine.

ELIZABETH: Give me the ring.

ESSEX: No.

ELIZABETH: Give me the ring. I'd rather you killed me

Than I killed you.

ESSEX: It's better for me as it is

Than that I should live and batten my fame and for-

On the woman I love. I've thought of it all. It's

To die young and unblemished than to live long and rule,

And rule not well.

ELIZABETH: Aye, I should know that.

ESSEX: Is it not? ELIZABETH: Yes. ESSEX: Good-by, then.

ELIZABETH: Oh, then I'm old, I'm old!
I could be young with you, but now I'm old.
I know now how it will be without you. The sun
Will be empty and circle round an empty earth . . .
And I will be queen of emptiness and death. . . .
Why could you not have loved me enough to give me

Your love and let me keep as I was?

essex: I know not.

I only know I could not. I must go.

ELIZABETH: [Frozen] Yes. [He goes to the door]

Lord Essex! [He turns]

Take my kingdom. It is yours!

[Essex, as if not hearing, bows and goes on.

Penelope runs in, meeting him]

PENELOPE: My lord! She has forgiven you?

ESSEX: Good-by, my dear. [He kisses her]
PENELOPE: No, no! She loves you! Go to her.

[Essex goes out]
Run to her! She waits you still! See, if you turn

She waits you still! Dear queen, would you let him go?

He goes to his death! Send, send after him!

[The queen lifts her head and shows a face so stricken that Penelope, who has gone to her, says no more. The clock strikes six. Elizabeth bows her head on Penelope's knees, her hands over her ears]

CURTAIN

Marc Connelly

(1890 - - - - -)

It would appear that Marc Connelly had to lose one good reputation in order to gain another, greater one. For several years he was well known as George S. Kaufman's collaborator on successful travesties of American life and manners. Connelly, one supposes, could have helped to turn these out indefinitely. Instead, he went his own way and encountered a number of defeats in the theatrical market place. He tasted one victory, however, of the kind that nullifies many reverses and compensates a writer for many disappointments; he wrote a play that is inscribed in the permanent records of the American theatre: The Green Pastures. Here he attempted to blend folk imagination with New Testament faith. The results were, not too surprisingly, of a different order of excellence from the results of collaboration with Kaufman.

Connelly was born and spent his boyhood in McKeesport, Pennsylvania. After some higher education, he began writing a daily column of quips for a newspaper in Pittsburgh. His thoughts turned to the theatre, and he inevitably gravitated to New York. He remained there in spite of the failure of his first stage venture, the musical play The Amber Princess (1916), to which he contributed the lyrics. After some lean years of free-lancing and play doctoring, he had the good fortune in 1921 to form a partnership with another immigrant from Pennsylvania, George S. Kaufman, then editing the drama page of the New York Times. The two men took for their first subject "Dulcinea," a bromidic female celebrated in Franklin P. Adams' famous New York World column. The result was the comedy Dulcy, about a dull-witted, interfering woman who was to be a symbol of feminine ineptitude for an entire generation. Later in 1921, Kaufman and Connelly won a second hearing on Broadway with the warm comedy of middle-class home life To the Ladies, in which the authors were more complimentary to womanhood. A year later, they made theatrical history by turning out the first of Broadway's numerous satires on Hollywood, Merton of the Movies, and in 1924, they reached the peak of their partnership with the clever expressionistic satire Beggar on Horseback. Connelly must have had a larger share than usual in the writing of the latter play, since it embodies his characteristic qualities of comic fantastication. A devastating dream play based on a young artist's fear that marriage would doom him to the treadmill of big business, Beggar on Horseback was one of the best products of the then fashionable Greenwich Village revolt against the machine age. With this play, however, the Kaufman-Connelly partnership ended.

Connelly started the next phase of his career auspiciously enough, when his independent talent for tenderness and fancy asserted itself in The Wisdom Tooth (1926). But this comedy was followed by reverses until he had the good fortune to write The Green Pastures (1930), a play based on Roark Bradford's collection of more or less genuine Negro folk tales, Ol' Man Adam an' His Chillun. The play was brilliantly staged against expressive settings by Robert Edmond Jones with an all-Negro cast, among whom Richard Harrison distinguished himself with a portrayal of "de Lawd" remarkably moving in its simplicity and dignity.

Negro life and manners had interested serious dramatists for a decade, and some of the playwriting inspired by regional literature and theatre was of a high order. The romantic folk drama was already well represented on Broadway by Dorothy and Du Bose Heyward's Porgy (1927). For Connelly, however, the regional background was a matter of secondary interest. He sublimated folk drama into religious drama, concluding a play enlivened by scenes such as the celestial fish fry with a mystic vision of the crucifixion.

The Green Pastures is unique: it cannot be placed in any existing classification without some reservations. The Catholic critic Richard Dana Skinner accused Connelly of "sinning against real simplicity," and it is indeed questionable whether the playwright did not veer too far from either folk or religious drama in some details. Is there no discrepancy between the "Harlem" scene and the spirit of the play? Is the play entirely free from a spirit of condescent sion toward primitive folk and their notions? Yet one cannot overlook the tremendous fascination the play exerted for years after it opened on Broadway. It seemed the culmination of everything we considered a movement toward folk drama for at least a decade, and it was also the only religious drama anyone had succeeded in making tolerable to the American public since the vogue of Charles Rann Kennedy's old-fashioned morality play The Servani in the House.

AUTHOR'S NOTE

The Green Pastures is an attempt to present certain aspects of a living religion in the terms of its believers. The religion is that of thousands of Negroes in the deep South. With terrific spiritual hunger and the greatest humility, these untutored black Christians—many of whom cannot even read the book which is the treasure house of their faith—have adapted the contents of the Bible to the consistencies of their everyday lives.

Unburdened by the differences of more educated theologians, they accept the Old Testament as a chronicle of wonders which happened to people like themselves in vague but actual places, and of rules of conduct, true acceptance of which will lead them to a tangible, three-dimensional Heaven. In this Heaven, if one has been born in a district where fish fries are popular, the angels do have magnificent fish fries through an eternity somewhat resembling a series of earthly holidays. The Lord Jehovah will be the promised comforter, a just but compassionate patriarch, the summation of all the virtues. His follower has observed in the human beings about him. The Lord may look like the Reverend Mr.

Dubois, as our Sunday-School teacher speculates in the play, or he may resemble another believer's own grandfather. In any event, His face will be familiar to the one who has come for his reward.

The author is indebted to Mr. Roark Bradford, whose retelling of several of the Old Testament stories in Ol Man Adam an' His Chillun first stimulated his interest in this point of view.

One need not blame a hazy memory of the Bible for the failure to recall the characters of Hezdrel, Zeba and others in the play. They are the author's apocrypha, but he believes persons much like them have figured in the meditations of some of the old Negro preachers, whose simple faith he has tried to translate into a play.

PART I. SCENE I.

A corner in a Negro church. Ten Children and an elderly Preacher. The costumes are those that might be seen in any lower Louisiana town at Sunday-School time. As the curtain rises, Mr. Deshee, the preacher, is reading from a Bible. The Children are listening with varied degrees of interest. Three or four are wide-eyed in their attention. Two or three are obviously puzzled, but interested, and the smallest ones are engaged in more physical concerns. One is playing with a little doll, and another runs his finger on all angles of his chair.

DESHEE: "An' Adam lived a hundred and thirty years, an' begat a son in his own likeness, after his image; an' called his name Seth. An' de days of Adam, after he had begotten Seth, were eight hundred years! An' he begat sons an' daughters; an' all de days dat Adam lived were nine hundred an' thirty years; an' he died. An' Seth lived a hundred an' five years an' begat Enos; an' Seth lived after he begat Enos eight hundred an' seven years an' begat sons and daughters. An' all de days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years; an' he died." An' it go like dat till we come to Enoch an' de Book say: "An' Enoch lived sixty an' five years and begat Methuselah." Den it say: "An' all de days of Methuselah were nine hund'ed an' sixty an' nine years an' he died." An' dat was de oldest man dat ever was. Dat's why we call oi' Mr. Gurney's mammy ol' Mrs. Methuselah, caize she's so ol'. Den a little later it tell about another member of de fam'ly. His name was Noah. Maybe some of you know about him already. I'm gonter tell you all about him next Sunday. Anyway dat's de meat an' substance of de first five chapters of Genesis. Now, how you think you gonter like de Bible?

MYRTLE: I think it's jest wonderful, Mr. Deshee. I cain't understand any of it.

FIRST BOY: Why did dey live so long, Mr. Deshee? DESHEE: Why? Caize dat was de way God felt.

SECOND BOY: Dat made Adam away back.

DESHEE: Yes, he certainly 'way back by de time Noah come along. Want to ask me any mo' questions?

SECOND BOY: What de worl' look like when de Lawd begin, Mr. Deshee?

DESHEE: How yo' mean what it look like?

MYRTLE: Carlisle mean who was in N'Orleans den.

DESHEE: Dey wasn't nobody in N'Orleans on 'count dey wasn't any N'Orleans. Dat's de whole idea I tol' you at de end of de first Chapter. Yo' got to git yo' minds fixed. Dey wasn't any Rampart Street. Dey wasn't any Canal Street. Dey wasn't any Louisiana. Dey wasn't nothin' on de earth at all caize fo' de reason dey wasn't any earth.

MYRTLE: Yes, but what Carlisle wanter know is— DESHEE: [Interrupting and addressing little boy who has been playing with his chair and paying no attention] Now, Randolph, if you don't listen, how yo' gonter grow up and be a good man? Yo' wanter grow up an' be a transgressor?

LITTE BOY: [Frightened] No.

DESHEE: You tell yo' mammy yo' sister got to come wid you next time. She kin git things done in time to bring you to de school. You content yo'self. [The little boy straightens up in his chair] Now, what do Carlisle want to know?

SECOND BOY: How He decide He want de worl' to be right yere and how He git de idea He wanted it?

MYRTLE: Caize de Book say, don't it, Mr. Deshee? DESHEE: De Book say, but at de same time dat's a good question. I remember when I was a little boy de same thing recurred to me. An' ol' Mr. Dubois, he was a wonderful preacher at New Hope Chapel over in East Gretna, he said: "De answer is dat de Book ain't got time to go into all de details." And he was right. You know sometimes I think de Lawd expects us to figure out a few things for ourselves. We know dat at one time dey wasn't anything except Heaven. We don't know jest where it was but we know it was dere. Maybe it was everywhere. Den one day de Lawd got the idea He'd like to make some places. He made de sun and de moon, de stars. An' He made de earth.

MYRTLE: Who was aroun' den, nothin' but angels? DESHEE: I suppose so.

FIRST BOY: What was de angels doin' up dere?

DESHEE: I suppose dey jest flew aroun' and had a good time. Dey wasn't no sin, so dey musta had a good time.

FIRST BOY: Did dey have picnics?

DESHEE: Sho, dey had the nicest kind of picnics. Dey probably had fish fries, wid b'iled custard and ten-cent seegars for de adults. God gives us humans lotsa ideas about havin' good times. Maybe dey were things he'd seen de angels do. Yes, sir, I bet dey had a fish fry every week.

MYRTLE: Did dey have Sunday School, too?

DESHEE: Yes, dey musta had Sunday School for de cherubs.

MYRTLE: What did God look like, Mr. Deshee? DESHEE: Well, nobody knows exactly what God looked like. But when I was a little boy I used to imagine dat He looked like de Reverend Dubois. He was de finest-looking ol' man I ever knew. Yes, I used to bet de Lawd looked exactly like Mr. Dubois in de days when He walked de earth in de shape of a natchel man.

MYRTLE: When was dat, Mr. Deshee?

DESHEE: Why, when He was gettin' things started down heah. When he talked to Adam and Eve and Noah and Moses and all dem. He made mighty men in dem days. But aldo dey was awful mighty dey always knew dat He was beyond dem all. Pretty near one o'clock, time fo' you chillun to go home to dinner, but before I let you go I wan' you to go over wid me de main facts of de first lesson. What's de name of de book?

CHILDREN: Genesis.

DESHEE: Dat's right. And what's de other name?

CHILDREN: First Book of Moses.

DESHEE: Da't right. And dis yere's Chapter One. [The lights begin to dim] "In de beginnin' God created de heaven and de earth. An' de earth was widout form an' void. An' de darkness was upon de face of de deep."

SCENE II.

In the darkness many voices are heard singing "Rise, Shine, Give God the Glory." They sing it gaily and rapidly. The lights go up as the second verse ends. The chorus is being sung diminuendo by a mixed company of angels. That is, they are angels in that they wear brightly colored robes and have wings protruding from their backs. Otherwise they look and act like a company of happy Negroes at a fish fry. The scene itself is a pre-Creation Heaven with compromises.

In the distance is an unbroken stretch of blue sky. Companionable varicolored clouds billow down to the floor of the stage and roll overhead to the branches of a live oak tree which is up left. The tree is leafy and dripping with Spanish moss, and with the clouds makes a frame for the scene. In the cool shade of the tree are the usual appurtenances of a fish fry; a large kettle of hot fat set on two small parallel logs, with a fire going underneath, and a large rustic table formed by driving four stakes into the ground and placing planks on top of the small connecting boards. On the table are piles of biscuits and corn bread and the cooked fish in dish pans. There are one or two fairly large cedar or crock "churns" containing boiled custard, which looks like milk. There is a gourd dipper beside the churns and several glasses and cups of various sizes and shapes from which the custard is drunk.

The principal singers are marching two by two in a small area at the R. of the stage. Two Mammy Angels are attending to the frying beside the kettle. Behind the table a Man Angel is skinning fish and passing them to the cooks. Another is ladling out the custard. A Mammy Angel is putting fish on bread for a brood of cherubs, and during the first scene they seat themselves on a grassy bank upstage. Another Mammy Angel is clapping her hands disapprovingly and beckoning a laughing Boy Cherub down from a cloud a little out of her reach.

Another Mammy Angel is solicitously slapping the back of a Girl Cherub who has a large fish sandwich in her hand and a bone in her throat. There is much movement about the table, and during the first few minutes several individuals go up to the table to help themselves to the food and drink. Many of the Women Angels wear hats and a few of the Men are smoking cigars. A large boxful is on the table. There is much laughter and chatter as the music softens, but continues during the early part of the action. The following short scenes are played almost simultaneously.

SECOND COOK: [At kettle, calling off] Hurry up, Cajey. Dis yere fat's cryin' fo' mo' feesh.

A VOICE: [Off stage] We comin', fas' we kin. Dey got to be ketched, ain't dey? We cain't say, "C'm'on, little fish. C'm'on an' git fried," kin we?

SECOND COOK: [At table] De trouble is de mens is all worm fishin'.

FIRST MAN ANGEL: [At table] Whut diffrunce do it make? Yo' all de time got to make out like somebody's doin' somethin' de wrong way.

SECOND COOK: [Near table] I s'pose you got de per'fec' way fo' makin' bait.

FIRST MAN ANGEL: I ain't sayin' dat. I is sayin' whut's wrong wid worm fishin'.

SECOND COOK: Whut's wrong wid worm fishin'? Ever'thing, dat's all. Dey's only one good way fo' catfishin', and dat's minny fishin'. Anybody know dat.

FIRST MAN ANGEL: Well, it jest so happen dat minny fishin' is de doggondest fool way of fishin' dey is. You kin try minny fishin' to de cows come home an' all you catch'll be de backache. De trouble wid you, sister, is you jest got minny fishin' on de brain.

SECOND COOK: Go right on, loud mouf. You tell me de news. My, my! You jest de wisest person in de worl'. First you, den de Lawd God.

FIRST MAN ANGEL: [To the custard ladler] You cain't tell dem nothin'. [Walks away to the custard churn] Does you try to 'splain some simple fac' dey git man-deaf.

FIRST MAMMY ANGEL: [To Cherub on the cloud] Now, you heerd me. [The Cherub assumes several mocking poses, as she speaks] You fly down yere. You wanter be put down in de sin book? [She goes to the table, gets a drink for herself and points out the Cherub to one of the men behind the table] Dat baby must got imp blood in him he so vexin'. [She returns to her position under the cloud] You want me to fly up dere an' slap you down? Now, I to!'

[The Cherub starts to come down]

STOUT ANGEL: [To the Cherub with a bone in her throat] I tol' you you was too little fo' catfish. What you wanter git a bone in yo' froat fo'?

[She slaps the Cherub's back]

SLENDER ANGEL: [Leisurely eating a sandwich as she watches the back-slapping] What de trouble wid Leonetta?

STOUT ANGEL: She got a catfish bone down her froat. [To the Cherub] Doggone, I tol' you to eat grinnel instead.

SLENDER ANGEL: Ef'n she do git all dat et, she gonter have a belly-ache.

STOUT ANGEL: Ain't I tol' her dat? [To Cherub]

Come on now; let go dat bone. [She slaps Cherub's back again. The bone is dislodged and the Cherub grins her relief] Dat's good.

SLENDER ANGEL: [Comfortingly] Now she all right. STOUT ANGEL: Go on an' play wid yo' cousins. [The Cherub joins the Cherubs sitting on the embankment. The concurrency of scenes ends here] I ain't see you lately, Lily. How you been?

SLENDER ANGEL: Me, I'm fine. I been visitin' my mammy. She waitin' on de welcome table over by de throne of grace.

STOUT ANGEL: She always was pretty holy.

SLENDER ANGEL: Yes, ma'am. She like it dere. I guess de Lawd's took quite a fancy to her.

STOUT ANGEL: Well, dat's natural. I declare yo' mammy one of de finest lady angels I know.

SLENDER ANGEL: She claim you best one she know.

STOUT ANGEL: Well, when you come right down to it, I suppose we is all pretty near perfec'.

SLENDER ANGEL: Yes, ma'am. Why is dat, Mis' Jenny?

STOUT ANGEL: I s'pose it's caize de Lawd He don' 'low us 'sociatin' wid de devil any mo' so dat dey cain' be no mo' sinnin'.

SLENDER ANGEL: Po' ol' Satan. Whutevah become of him?

STOUT ANGEL: De Lawd put him some place, I s'pose.

SLENDER ANGEL: But dey ain't any place but Heaven, is dey?

STOUT ANGEL: De Lawd could make a place, couldn't He?

SLENDER ANGEL: Dat's de truth. Dey's one thing confuses me though.

STOUT ANGEL: What's dat?

SLENDER ANGEL: I do a great deal of travelin' an' I ain't never come across any place but Heaven anywhere. So if de Lawd kick Satan out of Heaven jest whereat did he go? Dat's my question.

STOUT ANGEL: You bettah let de Lawd keep His own secrets, Lily. De way things is goin' now dey ain't been no sinnin' since dey give dat scamp a kick in de pants. Nowadays Heaven's free of sin an' if a lady wants a little constitutional she kin fly 'til she wing-weary widout gittin' insulted.

SLENDER ANGEL: I was jest a baby when Satan lef'. I don't even 'member what he look like.

STOUT ANGEL: He was jest right fo' a devil. [An Archangel enters. He is older than the others and wears a white beard. His clothing is much darker than that of the others and his wings a trifle more imposing] Good mo'nin', Archangel.

[Others say good morning]

ARCHANGEL: Good mo'nin', folks. I wonder kin I interrup' de fish fry an' give out de Sunday-School cyards? [Cries of "Suttingly!" "Mah goodness, yes"—etc. The marching Choir stops] You kin keep singin' if you want to. Why don' you sing "When de Saints Come Marchin' In"? Seem to me I ain't heard dat lately. [The Choir begins "When de Saints Come Marchin' In," rather softly, but does not resume the marching. The Archangel looks off left] All right, bring 'em yere [A prim-looking Woman Teacher-Angel enters, shepherding ten Boy and Girl Cherubs. The Teacher carries ten beribboned diplomas, which she gives to the Archangel. The Cherubs are dressed in stiffly starched white suits and dresses, the little girls having enormous ribbons at the backs of their dresses and smaller ones in their hair and on the tips of their wings. They line up in front of the Archangel and receive the attention of the rest of the company. The Choir sings through the ceremony] Now den, cherubs, why is you yere?

CHILDREN: Because we so good.

ARCHANGEL: Dat's right. Now who de big boss? CHILDREN: Our dear Lawd.

ARCHANGEL: Dat's right. When you all grow up what you gonter be?

CHILDREN: Holy angels at de throne of grace.

ARCHANGEL: Dat's right. Now, you passed yo' 'zaminations and it gives me great pleasure to hand out de cyards for de whole class. Gineeva Chaproe. [The First Girl Cherub goes to him and gets her diploma. The Choir sings loudly and resumes marching, as the Archangel calls out another name—and presents diplomas] Corey Moulter. [Second Girl Cherub gets her diploma] Nootzie Winebush. [Third Girl Cherub] Harriet Prancy. [Fourth Girl Cherub] I guess you is Brozain Stew't. [He gives the Fifth Girl Cherub the paper. Each of the presentations has been accompanied by handclapping from the bystanders] Now you boys know yo' own names. Suppose you come yere and help me git dese 'sorted right'?

[Boy Cherubs gather about him and receive their diplomas. The little Girls have scattered about the stage, joining groups of the Adult Angels. The angel Gabriel enters. He is bigger and more elaborately winged than even the Archangel, but he is also much younger and beardless. His costume is less conventional than that of the other men, resembling more the Gabriel of the Doré drawings. His appearance causes a flutter among the others. They stop their chattering with the Children. The Choir stops as three or four audible whispers of "Gabriel!" are heard. In a moment the heavenly company is all attention

GABRIEL: [Lifting his hand] Gangway! Gangway for de Lawd God Jehovah!

[There is a reverent hush and God enters. He is the tallest and biggest of them all. He wears a white shirt with a white bow tie, a long Prince Albert coat of black alpaca, black trousers and congress gaiters. He looks at the assemblage. There is a pause. He speaks in a rich, bass voice]

GOD: Is you been baptized?

OTHERS: [Chanting] Certainly, Lawd.

GOD: Is you been baptized? OTHERS: Certainly, Lawd.

GOD: [With the beginning of musical notation] Is you been baptized?

OTHERS: [Now half-singing] Certainly, Lawd. Certainly, certainly, certainly, Lawd.

[They sing the last two verses with equivalent part division]

Is you been redeemed?

Certainly, Lawd.

Is you been redeemed?

Certainly, Lawd.

Is you been redeemed?

Certainly, Lawd. Certainly, certainly, Lawd.

Do you bow mighty low?

Certainly, Lawd.

Do you bow mighty low?

Certainly, Lawd.

Do you bow mighty low?

Certainly, Lawd. Certainly, certainly, cartainly, Lawd.

[As the last response ends all heads are bowed. God looks at them for a moment; then lifts His hand]

GOD: Let de fish fry proceed.

[Everyone rises. The Angels relax and resume their inaudible conversations. The activity behind the table and about the cauldron is resumed. Some of the Choir members cross to the table and get sandwiches and cups of the boiled custard. Three or four of the Children in the Sunday-School class and the girl who had the bone in her throat affectionately group themselves about God as He speaks with the Archangel. He pats their heads, they hang to His coat-tails, etc.]

ARCHANGEL: Good mo'nin', Lawd.

GOD: Good mo'nin', Deacon. You lookin' pretty spry.

ACHANGEL: I cain' complain. We just been givin' out cyards to de chillun.

GOD: Dat's good.

[A small Cherub, his feet braced against one of God's shoes, is using God's coat-tail as a trapeze. One of the Cooks offers a fish sandwich which God politely declines]

FIRST MAMMY ANGEL: Now, you leave go de Lawd's coat, Herman. You heah me?

GOD: Dat's all right, sister. He jest playin'.

FIRST MAMMY ANGEL: He playin' too rough.

[God picks up the Cherub and spanks him good-naturedly. The Cherub squeals with delight and runs to his mother. Gabriel advances to God with a class of the gustard!

to God with a glass of the custard]

GABRIEL: Little b'iled custud, Lawd?

GOD: Thank you very kindly. Dis looks nice.

CUSTARD MAKER: [Offering a box] Ten-cent seegar, Lawd?

GOD: [Taking it] Thank you, thank you. How de fish fry goin'? [Ad. lib. cries of "O.K., Lawd," "Fine an' dandy, Lawd," "De best one yit, Lawd," etc. To the Choir] How you shouters gittin' on?

CHOIR LEADER: We been marchin' and singin' de whole mo'nin'.

GOD: I heerd you. You gittin' better all de time. You gittin' as good as de one at de throne. Why don' you give us one dem ol' time jump-ups?

CHOIR LEADER: Anythin' you say, Lawd. [To the Others] "So High!"

[The Choir begins to sing "So High You Can't Get Over It." They sing softly, but do not march. An Angel offers his cigar to God from which He can light His own]

GOD: No, thanks. I'm gonter save dis a bit.

[He puts His cigar in His pocket and listens to the singers a moment. Then He sips His custard. After the second sip, a look of displeasure comes on His face]

GABRIEL: What's de matter, Lawd?

GOD: [Sipping again] I ain't jest sure, yit. Dey's something 'bout dis custahd.

[Takes another sip]

CUSTARD MAKER: Ain't it all right, Lawd?

GOD: It don't seem seasoned jest right. You make

CUSTARD MAKER: Yes, Lawd. I put everythin' in it like I allus do. It's supposed to be perfec'.

GOD: Yeah. I kin taste de eggs and de cream and de sugar. [Suddenly] I know what it is. It needs jest a little bit mo' firmament.

CUSTARD MAKER: Dey's firmament in it, Lawd.

GOD: Maybe, but it ain't enough.

CUSTARD MAKER: It's all we had, Lawd. Dey ain't a drap in de jug.

GOD: Dat's all right. I'll jest r'ar back an' pass a miracle. [Choir stops singing] Let it be some firmament! An' when I say let it be some firmament, I don't want jest a little bitty dab o' firmament, caize I'm sick an' tired of runnin' out of it when we need it. Let it be a whole mess of firmament! [The stage has become misty until God and the heavenly company are obscured. As He finishes the speech there is a burst of thunder. As the stage grows darker] Dat's de way I like it.

[Murmurs from the others: "Dat's a lot of firmament!" "Look to me like He created rain," etc.]

FIRST MAMMY ANGEL: [When the stage is dark] Now, look, Lawd, dat's too much firmament. De cherubs is gettin' all wet.

SECOND MAMMY ANGEL: Look at my Carlotta, Lawd. She's soaked to de skin. Dat's plenty too much firmament, GOD: Well, 'co'se we don't want the chillun to ketch cold. Can't you dreen it off?

GABRIEL: Dey's no place to dreen it, Lawd.

FIRST MAMMY ANGEL: Why don't we jest take de babies home, Lawd?

GOD: No, I don' wanta bust up de fish fry. You angels keep quiet an I'll pass another miracle. Dat's always de trouble wid miracles. When you pass one you always gotta r'ar back an' pass another. [There is a hush] Let dere be a place to dreen off dis firmament. Let dere be mountains and valleys an' let dere be oceans an' lakes. An' let dere be rivers and bayous to dreen it off in, too. As a matter of fac' let dere be de earth. An' when dat's done let dere be de sun, an' let it come out and dry my cherubs' wings.

[The lights go up until the stage is bathed in sunlight. On the embankment upstage there is now a waist-high wrought-iron railing such as one sees on the galleries of houses in the French Quarter of New Orleans. The Cherubs are being examined by their parents and there is an ad lib. murmur of, "You all right, honey?" "You feel better now, Albert?" "Now you all dry, Vangy?" until the Archangel, who has been gazing in awe at the railing, drowns them out] archangel: Look yere!

[There is a rush to the embankment accompanied by exclamations, "My goodness!" "What's dis?" "I declah!" etc. Gabriel towers above the group on the middle of the embankment. God is wrapped in thought, facing the audience. The Choir resumes singing "So High You Can't Get Over It" softly. The babbling at the balustrade dies away as the people lean over the railing. Gabriel turns and faces God indicating the earth below the railing with his left hand]

GABRIEL: Do you see it. Lawd?

GOD: [Quietly, without turning His head upstage] Yes, Gabriel.

GABRIEL: Looks mighty nice, Lawd. GOD: Yes.

[Gabriel turns and looks over the railing]

GABRIEL: [Gazing down] Yes, suh. Dat'd make mighty nice farming country. Jest look at dat south forty over dere. You ain't going to let dat go to waste is you, Lawd? Dat would be a pity an' a shame.

GOD: [Not turning] It's a good earth. [God turns, room is made for Him beside Gabriel on the embankment] Yes. I ought to have somebody to enjoy it. [He turns, facing the audience. The others, save for the Choir who are lined up in two rows of six on an angle up right, continue to look over the embankment] Gabriel. [God steps down from the embankment two paces]

GABRIEL: [Joining him] Yes, Lawd. GOD: Gabriel, I'm goin' down dere.

GABRIEL: Yes, Lawd.

GOD: I want you to be my working boss yere while I'm gone.

GABRIEL: Yes, Lawd.

GOD: You know dat matter of dem two stars?

GABRIEL: Yes, Lawd.

GOD: Git dat fixed up! You know dat sparrow dat fell a little while ago? Tend to dat, too.

GABRIEL: Yes, Lawd.

GOD: I guess dat's about all. I'll be back Saddy [To the Choir] Quiet, angels. [The Choir stops singing. Those on the embankment circle downstage. God goes to embankment. Turns and faces the company] I'm gonter pass one more miracle. You all gonter help me an' not make a soun' caize it's one of the most impo'tant miracles of all. [Nobody moves. God turns, facing the sky, and raises His arms above His head] Let dere be man.

[There is growing roll of thunder as stage grows dark. The Choir bursts into "Hallelujah," and continues until the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE III.

Enclosing the stage is a heterogeneous cluster of cottonwood, camphor, live oak, and sycamore trees, youpon and turkey berry bushes, with their purple and red berries, sprays of fern-like indigo fiera and splashes of various Louisiana flowers. In the middle of the stage, disclosed when the mistiness at rise grows into warm sunlight, stands Adam.

He is a puzzled man of thirty, of medium height, dressed in the clothing of the average field hand. He is bare-headed. In the distance can be heard the Choir continuing "Bright Mansions Above." A bird begins to sing. Adam smiles and turns to look at the source of this novel sound. He senses his strength and raises his forearms, his fists clenched. With his left hand he carefully touches the muscles of his upper right arm. He smiles again, realizing his power. He looks at his feet which are stretched wide apart. He stamps once or twice and now almost laughs in his enjoyment. Other birds begin trilling and Adam glances up joyfully toward the foliage. God enters.

GOD: Good mo'nin', Son.

ADAM: [With a little awe] Good mo'nin', Lawd.

GOD: What's yo' name, Son?

ADAM: Adam. GOD: Adam which?

ADAM: [Frankly, after a moment's puzzled groping] Jest Adam, Lawd.

god: Well, Adam, how dey treatin' you? How's things goin'?

ADAM: Well, Lawd, you know it's kind of a new line of wukk.

GOD: You'll soon get the hang of it. You know yo' kind of a new style with me.

ADAM; Oh, I guess I'm gonter make out all right soon as I learn de ropes.

GOD: Yes, I guess you will. Yo' a nice job.

ADAM: Yes, Lawd.

GOD: Dey's jest one little thing de matter with you. Did you notice it?

ADAM: Well, now you mentioned it, Lawd, I kind of thought dey was somethin' wrong.

GOD: Yes, suh, you ain't quite right. Adam, you need a family. De reason for dat is in yo' heart you is a family man. [Flicking the ash off His cigar] I'd say dat was de main trouble at de moment.

ADAM: [Smiling] Yes, suh. [His smile fades and he is puzzled again] At de same time—dey's one thing puzzlin' me, Lawd. Could I ask you a question?

GOD: Why certainly, Adam,

ADAM: Lawd, jest what is a family?

GOD: I'm gonter show you. [Indicates a spot] Jest lie down here, Adam. Make out like you was goin' to slumber.

ADAM: [Gently] Yes, Lawd.

[He lies down. God stands beside him and as He raises His arms above His head the lights go down. In the darkness God speaks]

GOD: Eve. [Lights go up. Eve is standing beside Adam. She is about twenty-six, and quite pretty. She is dressed like a country girl. Her gingham dress is quite new and clean. God is now at the other side of the stage, looking at them critically. Eve looks at Adam in timid wonder and slowly turns her head until she meets the glance of God. Adam stands beside Eve. They gaze at each other for a moment. God smiles] Now you all right, Eve. [Adam and Eve face Him] Now I'll tell you what I'm gonter do. I'm gonter put you in charge here. I'm gonter give you de run of dis whole garden. Eve, you take care of dis man, an' Adam, you take care of dis woman. You belong to each other. I don' want you to try to do much caize yo' both kind of experiment wid me an' I ain't sho' whether yo' could make it. You two jest enjoy yo'self. Drink de water from de little brooks an' de wine from de grapes an' de berries, an' eat de food dat's hangin' for you in de trees. [He pauses, startled by a painful thought] Dat is, in all but one tree. [He pauses. Then, not looking at them] You know what I mean, my children?

ADAM and EVE: Yes, Lawd.

[They slowly turn their heads left, toward the branches of an offstage tree. Then they look back at God]

ADAM: Thank you, Lawd. eve: Thank you, Lawd.

GOD: I gotter be gittin' along now. I got a hund'ed thousan' things to do 'fo' you take yo' nex' breath. Enjoy yo'selves——

[God exits. Adam and Eve stand looking after Him for a moment, then each looks down and watches their hands meet and clasp. After a moment they lift their heads slowly until they are again gazing at the tree]

EVE: Adam.

ADAM: [Looking at the tree, almost in terror] What?

EVE: [Softly as she too continues to look at the tree] Adam.

[The Choir begins singing "Turn You Round" and as the lights go down the Choir continues until there is blackness. The Choir suddenly stops. The following scene is played in the darkness]

MR. DESHEE'S VOICE: Now, I s'pose you chillun know what happened after God made Adam 'n' Eve. Do you?

FIRST GIRL'S VOICE: I know, Mr. Deshee.

MR. DESHEE'S VOICE: Jest a minute, Randolph. Didn't I tell you you gotta tell yo' mammy let yo' sister bring you? Carlisle, take way dat truck he's eatin'. You sit by him, see kin you keep him quiet. Now, den, Myrtle, what happened?

FIRST GIRL'S VOICE: Why den dey ate de fo'bidden fruit and den dey got driv' out de Garden.

MR. DESHEE'S VOICE: An' den what happened? FIRST GIRL'S VOICE: Den dey felt ver' bad.

MR. DESHEE'S VOICE: I don' mean how dey feel, I mean how dey do. Do dey have any children or anything like dat?

FIRST GIRL'S VOICE: Oh, yes, suh, dey have Cain 'n' Abel.

MR. DESHEE'S VOICE: Dat's right, dey have Cain 'n' Abel.

BOY'S VOICE: Dat was a long time after dey got married, wasn't it, Mr. Deshee? My mammy say it was a hund'ed years.

MR. DESHEE'S VOICE: Well, nobody kin be so sure. As I tol' you befo' dey was jest beginnin' to be able to tell de time an' nobody was any too sure 'bout anythin' even den. So de bes' thing to do is jest realize dat de thing happened an' don't bother 'bout how many years it was. Jest remember what I told you about it gittin' dark when you go to sleep an' it bein' light when you wake up. Dat's de way time went by in dem days. One thing we do know an' dat was dis boy Cain was a mean rascal.

[The lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE IV.

A Roadside.

Cain, a husky young Negro, stands over the body of the dead Abel. Both are dressed as laborers. Cain is looking at the body in awe, a rock in his right hand. God enters.

GOD: Cain, look what you done to Abel.

cain: Lawd, I was min'in' my own business and he come monkeyin' aroun' wit' me. I was wukkin' in de fiel' an' he was sittin' in de shade of de tree. He say "Me, I'd be skeered to git out in dis hot sun. I be 'fraid my brains git cooked. Co'se you ain't got no brains so you ain' in no danger." An' so I up and flang de rock. If it miss 'im all right, an' if it hit 'im all right. Dat's de way I feel.

gop: All right, but I'm yere to tell you dat's called a crime. When de new Judge is done talkin' to you you'll be draggin' a ball and chain de rest of yo' life.

CAIN: Well, what'd he want to come monkeyin' aroun' me fo' den? I was jest plowin', min'in' my own business, and not payin' him no min', and yere he come makin' me de fool. I'd bust anybody what make me de fool.

GOD: Well, I ain't sayin' you right an' I ain't sayin' you wrong. But I do say was I you I'd jest git myself down de road 'til I was clean out of de county. An' you better take an' git married an' settle down an' raise some chillun. Dey ain't nothin' to make a man fo'git his troubles like raisin' a family. Now, you better git.

CAIN: Yessuh.

[Cain walks off. God watches him from the forestage and as the lights begin to dim looks off. The Choir begins "Run, Sinner, Run"]

GOD: Adam an' Eve, you better try again. You better have Seth an' a lot mo' chillun.

[There is darkness. The Choir continues until the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE V.

Cain is discovered walking on an unseen treadmill. A middle distance of trees, hillsides and shrubbery passes him on an upper treadmill. Behind is the blue sky. He stops under the branches of a tree to look at a sign on a fence railing. Only half the tree is visible on the stage. The sign reads, "NoD PARISH. COUNTY LINE."

cain: [Sitting down with a sigh of relief under a tree] At las'! Phew! [Wipes his forehead with a hand-kerchief] Feels like I been walkin' fo'ty years. [He looks back] Well, dey cain' git me now. Now I kin raise a fam'ly. [An idea occurs to him, and suddenly he begins looking right and left] Well, I'll be hit by a mule! Knock me down for a trustin' baby! Where I gonter git dat family? Dat preacher fooled me. [He is quite dejected] Doggone!

CAIN'S GIRL: [Off stage] Hello, Country Boy!
[Cain glances up to the offstage branches of the tree]

CAIN: Hey-ho, Good-lookin'! Which way is it to town?

CAIN'S GIRL: [Off stage] What you tryin' to do? You tryin' to mash me? I be doggone if it ain't gittin' so a gal cain't hardly leave de house 'out some of dese fast men ain' passin' remarks at her.

CAIN: I ain' passin' remarks.

CAIN'S GIRL: [Off stage] If I thought you was tryin' to mash me, I'd call de police an' git you tooken to de first precinct.

CAIN: Look yere, gal, I ast you a question, an' if you don' answer me I'm gonter bend you 'cross my pants an' burn you up.

I, v

CAIN'S GIRL: [Off stage] I'm comin' down.

[Cain takes his eyes from the tree]

CAIN: Yes, an' you better hurry.

[Cain's Girl enters. She is as large as Cain, wickedly pretty, and somewhat flushily dressed. She smiles at Cain]

CAIN'S GIRL: I bet you kin handle a gal mean wid dem big stout arms of your'n. I sho' would hate to git you mad at me, Country Boy.

CAIN: [Smiling] Come yere [She goes a little closer to him] Don't be 'fraid, I ain' so mean.

CAIN'S GIRL: You got two bad-lookin' eyes. I bet yo' hot coffee 'mong de women folks.

CAIN: I ain' never find out. What was you doin' in dat tree?

CAIN'S GIRL: Jest coolin' myself in de element.

CAIN: Is you a Nod Parish gal?

CAIN'S GIRL: Bo'n an' bred.

CAIN: You know yo' kinda pretty.

CAIN'S GIRL: Who tol' you dat?

CAIN: Dese yere two bad eyes of mine.

CAIN'S GIRL: I bet you say dat to everybody all de way down de road.

CAIN: Comin' down dat road I din't talk to nobody.

CAIN'S GIRL: Where you boun' for, Beautiful?

CAIN: I'm jest seein' de country. I thought I might settle down yere fo' a spell. Yo' live wit' yo' people?

CAIN'S GIRL: Co'se I does.

CAIN: 'Spose dey'd like to take in a boarder?

CAIN'S GIRL: Be nice if dey would, wouldn't it?

CAIN: I think so. You got a beau?

CAIN'S GIRL: Huh-uh!

CAIN: [Smiling] You has now.

CAIN'S GIRL: I guess—I guess if you wanted to kiss me an' I tried to stop you, you could pretty nearly crush me wit' dem stout arms.

CAIN: You wouldn't try too much, would you?

CAIN'S GIRL: Maybe for a little while.

CAIN: An' den what?

CAIN'S GIRL: Why don' we wait an' see?

CAIN: When would dat be?

CAIN'S GIRL: To-night. After supper. Think you kin walk a little further now, City Boy?

CAIN: Yeh, I ain't so weary now.

[She takes his hand]

CAIN'S GIRL: What yo' name?

[Takes his arm]

CAIN: Cain.

CAIN'S GIRL: Then I'm Cain's Gal. Come on, honey, an' meet de folks.

[They go out, The Choir is heard singing "You Better Mind," as God enters. God watches the vanishing Cain and his girl]

GOD: [After shaking His head] Bad business. I don't like de way things is goin' a-tall.

[The stage is darkened. The Choir continues singing until the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE VI.

God's private office in Heaven. It is a small room, framed by tableau curtains. A large window up center looks out on the sky. There is a battered rolltop desk. On the wall next to the window is a framed religious oleograph with a calendar attached to it underneath. A door is at the left. A hat rack is on the wall above the door. There are two or three cheap pine chairs beside the window, and beyond the door. In front of the desk is an old swivel armchair which creaks every time God leans back in it. The desk is open and various papers are stuck in the pigeonholes. Writing implements, etc. are on the desk. On a shelf above the desk is a row of law books. A cuspidor is near the desk, and a waste basket by it. The general atmosphere is that of the office of a Negro lawyer in a Louisiana town, As the lights go up God takes a fresh cigar from a box on the desk and begins puffing it without bothering to light it. There is no comment on this minor miracle from Gabriel who is sitting in one of the chairs with a pencil and several papers in his hand. The singing becomes pianissimo.

GABRIEL: [Looking at the papers] Well, I guess dat's about all de impo'tant business this mornin', Lawd.

god: How 'bout dat cherub over to Archangel Montgomery's house?

GABRIEL: Where do dey live, Lawd?

[The singing stops]

GOD: Dat little two-story gold house, over by de pearly gates.

GABRIEL: Oh, dat Montgomery. I thought you was referrin' to de ol' gentleman. Oh, yeh. [He sorts through the papers and finds one he is looking for] Yere it 'tis. [Reads] "Cherub Christina Montgomery; wings is moltin' out of season an' nobody knows what to do."

GOD: Well, now, take keer of dat. You gotter be more careful, Gabe.

GABRIEL: Yes, Lawd.

[Folds the papers and puts them in a pocket. God turns to His desk, takes another puff or two of the cigar, and with a pencil, begins checking off items on a sheet of paper before Him. His back is turned toward Gabriel. Gabriel takes his trumpet from the hat rack and burnishes it with his robe. He then wets his lips and puts the mouthpiece to his mouth] D: [Without turning around] Now. watch

GOD: [Without turning around] Now, watch yo'self, Gabriel.

GABRIEL: I wasn't goin' to blow, Lawd. I jest do dat every now an' den so I can keep de feel of it.

[He leans trumpet against the wall. God picks up the papers and swings His chair around toward Gabriel]

GOD: What's dis yere about de moon?

GABRIEL: [Suddenly remembering] Oh! De moon people say it's beginnin' to melt a little, on 'count caize de sun's so hot.

GOD: It's goin' 'roun' 'cordin' to schedule, ain't it? GABRIEL: Yes, Lawd.

GOD: Well, tell 'em to stop groanin'. Dere's nothin' de matter wid dat moon. Trouble is so many angels is flyin' over dere on Saddy night. Dey git to beatin' dere wings when dey dancin' an' dat makes de heat. Tell dem dat from now on dancin' 'roun' de moon is sinnin'. Dey got to stop it. Dat'il cool off de moon. [He swings back and puts the paper on the desk. He leans back in the chair comfortably, His hands clasped behind His head] Is dere anythin' else you ought to remin' me of?

GABRIEL: De prayers, Lawd.

GOD: [Puzzled, slowly swinging chair around again] De prayers?

GABRIEL: From mankind. You know, down on de earth.

GOD: Oh, yeh, de poor little earth. Bless my soul, I almos' forgot about dat. Mus' be three or four hund'ed years since I been down dere. I wasn't any too pleased wid dat job.

GABRIEL: [Laughing] You know you don' make mistakes, Lawd.

dey tell me. [He looks at Gabriel, then through the window again] So dey tell me. I fin' I kin be displeased though, an' I was displeased wid de mankind I las' seen. Maybe I ought to go down dere agin—I need a little holiday.

GABRIEL: Might do you good, Lawd.

god: I think I will. I'll go down an' walk de earth agin an' see how dem poor humans is makin' out. What time is it, by de sun an' de stars?

GABRIEL: [Glancing out of the window] Jest exactly half-past, Lawd.

[God is taking His hat and stick from the hat rack]
GOD: [Opening the door] Well, take keer o' yo'self.
I'll be back Saddy.

[He exits. The stage is darkened. The Choir begins "Dere's No Hidin' Place," and continues until the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE VII.

God is walking along a country road. He stops to listen. Church bells are heard in the distance.

GOD: Dat's nice. Nice an' quiet. Dat's de way I like Sunday to be. [The sound is broken by a shrill voice of a girl. It is Zeba singing a "blues"] Now, dat ain't so good. [God resumes His walk and the upper treadmill brings on a tree stump on which Zeba is sitting. She is accompanying her song with a ukulele. God and the treadmills stop. When the stump reaches the center of the stage, it is seen that Zeba is a rouged and extremely flashily dressed chippy of about eighteen] Stop dat!

ZEBA: What's de matter wid you, Country Boy?

Pull up yo' pants.

[She resumes singing]

GOD: Stop dat!

ZEBA: [Stops again] Say, listen to me, Banjo Eyes. What right you got to stop a lady enjoyin' herself?

GOD: Don't you know dis is de Sabbath? Dat's no kin' o' song to sing on de Lawd's day.

ZEBA: Who care 'bout de Lawd's day any mo'? People jest use Sunday now to git over Saddy.

GOD: You a awful sassy little girl.

ZEBA: I come fum sassy people! We even speak mean of de dead.

god: What's yo' name?

ZEBA: [Flirtatiously] "What's my name?" Ain't you de ol'-time gal hunter! Fust, "What's my name?" den I s'pose, what would it be like if you tried to kiss me? You preachers is de debbils.

GOD: I ain't aimin' to touch you, daughter. [A sudden sternness frightens Zeba. She looks at him sharply] What is yo' name?

ZEBA: Zeba.

GOD: Who's yo' fam'ly?

ZEBA: I'm de great-great-gran'daughter of Seth.

GOD: Of Seth? But Seth was a good man.

ZEBA: Yeh, he too good, he die of holiness.

GOD: An' yere's his little gran'daughter reekin' wid cologne. Ain't nobody ever tol' you yo' on de road to Hell?

ZEBA: [Smiling] Sho' dat's what de preacher say. Exceptin', of course, I happens to know dat I'm on de road to de picnic groun's, an' at de present time I'm waitin' to keep a engagement wid my sweet papa. He don' like people talkin' to me.

[Cain the Sixth enters. He is a young buck, wearing a "box" coat and the other flashy garments of a Rampart Street swell[

CAIN THE SIXTH: Hello, sugah! [He crosses in front of God and faces Zeba] Hello, mamma! Sorry I'm late, baby, but de gals in de barrel-house jest wouldn't let me go. Doggone, one little wirehead swore she'd tear me down.

[Zeba smiles and takes his hand]

GOD: What's yo' name, son?

CAIN THE SIXTH: [Contemptuously; without turn-ing] Soap 'n' water, Country Boy.

GOD: [Sternly] What's yo' name, son?

[Cain slowly turns and for a moment his manner is civil]

CAIN THE SIXTH: Cain the Sixth.

GOD: I was afraid so.

CAIN THE SIXTH: [His impudence returning] You a new preacher?

SON Whom were the

GOD: Where you live?

CAIN THE SIXTH: Me, I live mos' any place.

GOD: Yes, an' you gonter see dem all. Is de udder young men all like you?

CAIN THE SIXTH: [Smiling] De gals don' think so. [He turns towards Zeba again, picks her up and sits on the stump with the laughing Zeba on his lap]

ZEBA: Dey ain't nobody in de worl' like my honeycake.

[Cain kisses her and she resumes her song. God watches them. Zeba finishes a verse of the song and begins another softly. Cain the Sixth's eyes have been closed during the singing]

CAIN THE SIXTH: [His eyes closed] Is de preacher gone?

[Zeba looks quickly at God without seeing him, and then looks off. She stops the song]

ZEBA: Yeh, I guess he walks fast.

[Cain pushes her off his lap and rises]

CAIN THE SIXTH: [With acid sweetness] Dey tell me las' night you was talkin' to a creeper man, baby. ZEBA: Why, you know dey ain't nobody in de world fo' me but you.

CAIN THE SIXTH: [Smiling] I know dey ain't. I even got dat guaranteed. [Takes a revolver from his pocket] See dat, baby?

ZEBA: Sho' I see it, honey.

CAIN THE SIXTH: Dat jest makes me positive.

[Puts the gun back]

ZEBA: [Pushing him back on the stump] You don' wanter believe dem stories, papa.

CAIN THE SIXTH: [With sinister lightness] No. I didn't believe dem, baby. Co'se dat big gorilla, Flatfoot, from de other side of de river is in town ag'in. ZEBA: Dat don' mean nothin'. Flatfoot ain't CAIN THE SIXTH: [Sitting again] Co'se he ain't. Go 'head, sing some mo', baby.

[Zeba resumes singing]

nothin' to me.

GOD: Bad business. [The treadmills start turning. God resumes his walk. Zeba, still singing, and Cain the Sixth recede with the landscape. God is again alone on the country road. There is a twitter of birds. God looks up and smiles] De birds is goin' bout deir business, all right. [A patch of flowers goes by, black-eyed Susans, conspicuously] How you flowers makin' out? [Children's voices answer, "We O. K., Lawd." Yes, an' you looks very pretty. [Children's voices: "Thank you, Lawd." The flowers pass out of sight] It's only de human bein's makes me downhearted. Yere's as nice a Sunday as dev is turnin' out anywhere, an' nobody makin' de right use of it. [Something ahead of him attracts his attention. His face brightens] Well, now dis is mo' like it. Now dat's nice to see people prayin'. It's a wonder dey don' do it in de church. But I fin' I don' min' it if dey do it outdoors.

GAMBLER: Oh, Lawd, de smoke-house is empty. Oh, Lawd, lemme git dem groceries. Oh, Lawd, lemme see dat little six. [He casts the dice] Wham! Dere she is, frien's.

[Exclamations from the others: "Well, damn my eyes!" "Doggone, dat's de eighth pass he make." "For God's sake, can't you ever crap?" etc. The Boy is picking up the money]

GOD: Gamblin'! [Looks over the group's shoulders] An' wid frozen dice!

BOY GAMBLER: Dey's a dolla' 'n' a half talkin' fo' me. How much you want of it, Riney?

FIRST GAMBLER: I take fo' bits. Wait a minute. Mebbe I take a little mo.'

[He counts some money in his hand]

SECOND GAMBLER: [Glancing up at God] Hello, Liver Lips. [To the others] Looka ol' Liver Lips.

[The others look up and laugh good-naturedly, repeating "Liver Lips"]

FIRST GAMBLER: Ain't his pockets high from de groun'? Ol' High Pockets.

[The others keep saying "Ole Liver Lips." "Ol' Liver Lips don't like to see people dicin'." "Dat's a good name, 'High Pockets'"]

BOY GAMBLER: [To others] Come on, you gonter fade me or not?

[God seizes the Boy's ears and drags him to his feet. The others do not move, but watch, amused]

GOD: Come yere, son. Why, yo' jest a little boy. Gamblin' an' sinnin'. [God looks at the Boy's face] You been chewin' tobacco, too, like you was yo' daddy. [God sniffs] An' you been drinkin' sonny-kick-mammy wine. You oughta be 'shamed. [To the others] An' you gamblers oughta be 'shamed, leadin' dis boy to sin.

FIRST GAMBLER: He de bes' crap shooter in town, mister.

GOD: I'm gonter tell his mammy. I bet she don' know 'bout dis.

FIRST GAMBLER: No, she don' know. [The others laugh] She don' know anythin'.

SECOND GAMBLER: Dat's de God's truth.

FIRST GAMBLER: See kin you beat 'im, High Pockets. Dey's a dolla' open yere.

GOD: I ain't gonter beat 'im. I'm gonter teach 'im. I may have to teach you all.

[He starts walking from them. The Boy sticks out his tongue the moment God's back is turned]

BOY GAMBLER: If you fin' my mammy you do mo'n I kin. Come on, gamblers, see kin you gimme a little action. Who wants any part of dat dollar?

[The treadmill carries them off. The First Gambler is heard saying: "I'll take anoder two bits," and the others, "Gimme a dime's wo'th," "I ain't only got fifteen cents left," etc., as they disappear]

GOD: [Walking] Where's dat little boy's home? [The front of a shanty appears and God stops in front of the door] Yere's de place. It ain't any too clean, either.

[Knocks on the door with his cane]

VOICE IN SHANTY: Who dar?

GOD: Never you min' who's yere. Open de door. VOICE IN SHANTY: You gotta search warrant?

GOD: I don' need one.

VOICE IN SHANTY: Who you wanter see?

gon: I wanter see de mammy of de little gamblin' boy.

VOICE IN SHANTY: You mean little Johnny Rucker?

GOD: Dat may be his name.

VOICE IN SHANTY: Well, Mrs. Rucker ain't home.

GOD: Where's she at?

VOICE IN SHANTY: Who, Mrs. Rucker?

GOD: You heerd me.

VOICE IN SHANTY: Oh, she run away las' night wid a railroad man. She's eloped.

GOD: Where's Rucker?

VOICE IN SHANTY: He's flat under de table. He so drunk he cain't move.

GOD: Who are you?

VOICE IN SHANTY: I'se jest a frien' an' neighbor. I come in las' night to de party, an' everybody in yere's dead drunk but me. De only reason I kin talk is I drank some new white mule I made myself, an' it burn my throat so I cain't drink no mo'. You got any mo' questions?

GOD: Not for you.

[The shanty begins to move off as God starts walking again]

VOICE IN SHANTY: Good riddance, I say.

[Shanty disappears]

dis yere mankind I been peoplin' my earth wid sho' ain't much. [He stops and looks back] I got good min' to wipe 'em all off an' people de earth wid angels. No. Angels is all right, singin' an' playin' an' flyin' around, but dey ain't much on workin' de crops and buildin' de levees. No, suh, mankind's jest right for my earth, if he wasn't so doggone sinful. I'd rather have my earth peopled wit' a bunch of channel catfish, dan I would mankin' an' his sin. I jest cain't stan' sin.

[He is about to resume his walk when Noah enters. Noah is dressed like a country preacher. His coat is of the "hammer-tail" variety. He carries a prayer book under his arm] goo: Mo'nin', brother. I declare you look like a good man.

NOAH: I try to be, brother. I'm de preacher yere. I don't think I seen you to de meetin'.

[They resume walking]

GOD: I jest come to town a little while ago an' I been pretty busy.

NOAH: Yeh, mos' everybody say dey's pretty busy dese days. Dey so busy dey cain't come to meetin'. It seem like de mo' I preaches de mo' people ain't got time to come to church. I ain't hardly got enough members to fill up de choir. I gotta do de preachin' an' de bassin' too.

GOD: Is dat a fac'?

NOAH: Yes, suh, brother. Everybody is mighty busy, gamblin', good-timin', and goin' on. You jest wait, though. When Gabriel blow de horn you gonter fin' dey got plenty of time to punch chunks down in Hell. Yes, suh.

GOD: Seems a pity. Dey all perfec'ly healthy?

NOAH: Oh, dey healthy, all right. Dey jest all lazy, and mean, and full of sin. You look like a preacher, too, brother.

GOD: Well, I am, in a way.

NOAH: You jest passin' through de neighborhood? GOD: Yes. I wanted to see how things was goin' in yo' part of de country, an' I been feelin' jest 'bout de way you do. It's enough to discourage you.

NOAH: Yes, but I gotta keep wres'lin' wid 'em. Where you boun' for right now, brother?

GOD: I was jest walkin' along. I thought I might stroll on to de nex' town.

NOAH: Well, dat's a pretty good distance. I live right yere. [He stops walking] Why don' you stop an' give us de pleasure of yo' comp'ny for dinner? I believe my ol' woman has kilt a chicken.

GOD: Why, dat's mighty nice of you, brother. I don't believe I caught yo' name.

NOAH: Noah, jest brother Noah. Dis is my home, brother. Come right in.

[God and Noah start walking towards Noah's house which is coming into view on the treadmill. The stage darkens, the Choir sings "Feastin' Table," and when the lights go up again, the next scene is disclosed

SCENE VIII.

Interior of Noah's house. The ensemble suggests the combination living-dining room in a fairly prosperous Negro's cabin. Clean white curtains hang at the window. A table and chairs are in the center of the room. There is a cheerful checked tablecloth on the table, and on the wall, a framed, highly colored picture reading "God Bless Our Home." Noah's Wife, an elderly Negress, simply and neatly dressed, God and Noah are discovered grouped about the table.

NOAH: Company, darlin'. [Noah's Wife takes Noah's and God's hats] Dis gemman's a preacher, too. He's jest passin' through de country.

GOD: Good mo'nin', sister.

NOAH'S WIFE: Good mo'nin'. You jest ketch me when I'm gittin' dinner ready. You gonter stay with us?

GOD: If I ain't intrudin'. Brother Noah suggested-

NOAH'S WIFE: You set right down yere. I got a chicken in de pot an' it'll be ready in 'bout five minutes. I'll go out de back an' call Shem, Ham 'n' Japheth. [To God] Dey's our sons. Dey live right acrost de way but always have Sunday dinner wid us. You mens make yo'selves comf'table.

GOD: Thank you, thank you very kindly.

NOAH: You run along, we all right.

[God and Noah seat themselves. Noah's Wife exits]

GOD: You got a fine wife, Brother Noah.

NOAH: She pretty good woman.

GOD: Yes, suh, an' you got a nice little home. Have a ten-cent seegar?

[God offers him one]

NOAH: Thank you, much obliged.

[Both men lean back restfully in their chairs]
GOD: Jest what seems to be the main trouble 'mong mankind, Noah?

NOAH: Well, it seems to me dat de main trouble is dat de whol' distric' is wide open. Now you know dat makes fo' loose livin'. Men folks spen's all deir time fightin', loafin' and gamblin', an' makin' bad likker.

GOD: What about de women?

NOAH: De women is worse dan de men. If dey ain't makin' love powder dey out beg, borrow an' stealin' money for policy tickets. Doggone, I come in de church Sunday 'fo' las' 'bout an' hour befo' de meetin' was to start, and dere was a woman stealin' de altar cloth. She was goin' to hock it. Dey ain't got no moral sense. Now you take dat case las' month, over in East Putney. Case of dat young Willy Roback.

GOD: What about him?

NOAH: Dere is a boy seventeen years old. Doggone, if he didn't elope with his aunt. Now, you know, dat kin' of goin' on is bad fo' a neighborhood.

GOD: Terrible, terrible.

NOAH: Yes, suh. Dis use' to be a nice, decent community. I been doin' my best to preach de Word, but seems like every time I preach de place jest goes a little mo' to de dogs. De good Lawd only knows what's gonter happen.

GOD: Dat's de truth.

[There is a pause. Each puffs his cigar. Suddenly Noah grasps his knee, as if it were paining him, and twists his foot]

NOAH: Huh!

GOD: What's de matter?

NOAH: I jest got a twitch. My buckaguer I guess. Every now and den I gets a twitch in de knee. Might be a sign of rain.

GOD: That's just what it is. Noah, what's de mos' rain you ever had 'round dese parts?

NOAH: Well, de water come down fo' six days steady last April an' de ribber got so swole it bust down de levee up 'bove Freeport. Raise cain all de way down to de delta.

GOD: What would you say was it to rain for forty days and forty nights?

NOAH: I'd say dat was a complete rain!

GOD: Noah, you don't know who I is, do you?

NOAH: [Puzzled] Yo' face looks easy, but I don' think I recall de name. [God rises slowly, and as He reaches His full height there is a crash of lightning, a moment's darkness, and a roll of thunder. It grows light again. Noah is on his knees in front of God] I should have known you. I should have seen de glory.

GOD: Dat's all right, Noah. You didn' know who I was.

NOAH: I'm jes' ol' preacher Noah, Lawd, an' I'm yo' servant. I ain' very much, but I'se all I got.

son: Sit down, Noah. Don' let me hear you shamin' you'se'f, caize yo' a good man. [Timidly Noah waits until God is seated, and then sits, himself] I jest wanted to fin' out if you was good, Noah. Dat's why I'm walkin' de earth in de shape of a natchel man. I wish dey was mo' people like you. But, far as I kin see, you and yo' family is de only respectable people in de worl'.

NOAH: Dey jest all poor sinners, Lawd.

GOD: I know. I am your Lawd. I am a god of wrath and vengeance an' dat's why I'm gonter destroy dis worl'.

NOAH: [Almost in a whisper. Drawing back] Jest as you say, Lawd.

GOD: I ain't gonter destroy you, Noah. You and yo' family, yo' sheep an' cattle, an' all de udder things dat ain't human I'm gonter preserve. But de rest is gotta go. [Takes a pencil and a sheet of paper from His pocket] Look yere, Noah. [Noah comes over and looks over His shoulder] I want you to build me a boat. I want you to call it de "Ark," and I want it to look like dis. [He is drawing on the paper. Continues to write as He speaks] I want you to take two of every kind of animal and bird dat's in the country. I want you to take seeds an' sprouts an' everything like dat an' put dem on dat Ark, because dere is gonter be all dat rain. Dey's gonter be a deluge, Noah, an' dey's goin' to be a flood. De levees is gonter bust an' everything dat's fastened down is comin' loose, but it ain't gonter float long, caize I'm gonter make a storm dat'll sink everythin' from a hencoop to a barn. Dey ain't a ship on de sea dat'll be able to fight dat tempest. Dey all got to go. Everythin'. Everythin' in dis pretty worl' I made, except one thing, Noah. You an' yo' fam'ly an' de things I said are going to ride dat storm in de Ark. Yere's de way it's to be.

[He hands Noah the paper. Noah takes it and reads]

NOAH: [Pause. Looks at paper again] Yes, suh, dis seems to be complete. Now 'bout the animals, Lawd, you say you want everythin'?

GOD: Two of everythin'.

NOAH: Dat would include jayraffes an' hippopotamuses?

GOD: Everythin' dat is.

NOAH: Dey was a circus in town las' week. I guess I kin fin' dem. Co'se I kin git all de rabbits an' pos-sums an' wil' turkeys easy. I'll sen' de boys out. Hum, I'm jest wonderin'—

GOD: 'Bout what?

NOAH: 'Bout snakes. Think you'd like snakes, too? GOD: Certainly I want snakes.

NOAH: Oh, I kin git snakes, lots of 'em. Co'se some of 'em's a little dangerous. Maybe I better take a kag of likker, too?

GOD: You can have a kag of likker.

NOAH: [Musingly] Yes, suh, dey's a awful lot of differ'nt kin's of snakes, come to think about it. Dey's water moccasins, cotton-moufs, rattlers—mus' be a hund'ed kin's of other snakes down in de swamps. Maybe I better take two kags of likker.

GOD: [Mildly] I think de one kag's enough.

NOAH: No. I better take two kags. Besides I kin put one on each side of de boat, an' balance de ship wid dem as well as havin' dem fo' medicinal use.

GOD: You kin put one kag in de middle of de ship. NOAH: [Buoyantly] Jest as easy to take de two kags, Lawd.

GOD: I think one kag's enough.

NOAH: Yes, Lawd, but you see forty days an' forty

[There is a distant roll of thunder]

GOD: [Firmly] One kag, Noah.

NOAH: Yes, Lawd. One kag.

[The door in the back opens and Noah's Wife enters with a tray of dishes and food]

NOAH'S WIFE: Now, den, gen'lemen, if you'll jest draw up cheers.

[The stage is darkened. The Choir is heard singing "I Want to Be Ready." They continue in the darkness until the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE IX.

In the middle of the stage is the Ark. On the hillside, below the Ark, a dozen or more men and women, townspeople, are watching Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth on the deck of the Ark. The three sons are busily nailing boards on the cabin. Noah is smoking a pipe. He wears a silk hat, captain's uniform and a "slicker."

NOAH: [To Shem] You, Shem, tote up some ol' rough lumber; don' bring up any planed-up lumber, caize dat ain't fo' de main deck.

SHEM: Pretty near supper time, daddy.

NOAH: Maybe 'tis, but I got de feelin' we ought to keep goin'.

FIRST WOMAN: You gonter work all night, Noah, maybe, huh?

NOAH: [Without looking at her] If de speerit move me.

SECOND WOMAN: Look yere, Noah, whyn't you give up all dis damn foolishness? Don' you know people sayin' yo' crazy? What you think you doin' anyway?

NOAH: I'se buildin' a Ark. [Other men and women join those in the foreground] Ham, you better stop for a while 'n' see whether dey bringin' de animals up all right. [He looks at his watch] Dey ought to be pretty near de foot o' de hill by dis time; if dey ain't you wait fo' dem and bring 'em yo'se'f.

[Ham goes down a ladder at the side of the ship and exits during the following scene. The newcomers in the group have been speaking to some of the early arrivals]

SECOND WOMAN: [To Third Woman, one of the newcomers] No, you don't mean it!

THIRD WOMAN: I do so. Dat's what de talk is in de town.

FIRST MAN: You hear dat, Noah? Dey say yo' ol' lady is tellin' everybody it's gonter rain fo' fo'ty days and fo'ty nights. You know people soon gonter git de idea you all crazy.

NOAH: Lot I keer what you think. [To Japheth] Straighten up dem boards down dere, Japheth.

[Indicating floor deck]

FIRST MAN: [To Third Woman] Was I you, I wouldn' go 'round with Mrs. Noah any more, lady. First thing you know you'll be gittin' a hard name, too.

THIRD WOMAN: Don' I know?

SECOND WOMAN: A lady cain't be too partic'lar dese days.

[Zeba and Flatfoot, a tall, black, wicked-looking buck, enter, their arms around each other's waists]

ZEBA: Dere it is, baby. Was I lyin'? FLATFOOT: Well, I'll be split in two!

FIRST MAN: What you think of it, Flatfoot?

FLATFOOT: I must say! Look like a house wit' a warpin' cellar.

NOAH: Dis yere vessel is a boat.

FLATFOOT: When I was a little boy dey used to build boats down near de ribber, where de water was.

[The others laugh]

NOAH: Dis time it's been arranged to have de water come up to de boat. [Japheth looks belligerently over the rail of the Ark at Flatfoot. To Japheth] Keep yo' shirt on, son.

SECOND WOMAN: [To Third Woman] Now, you see de whole fam'ly crazy.

THIRD WOMAN: Listen, dey ain't gonter 'taminate me. It was me dat started resolvin' dem both out o' de buryin' society.

ZEBA: When all dis water due up yere, Noah?

NOAH: You won't know when it gits yere, daughter.

ZEBA: Is she goin' to be a side-wheeler, like de Bessy-Belle?

FLATFOOT: No! If she was a side-wheeler she'd get her wheels all clogged wid sharks. She gonter have jus' one great big stern wheel, like de Commodore. Den if dey ain't 'nuf water why de big wheel kin stir some up.

[General laughter. Two or three of the Gamblers enter and join the group, followed by Cain the Sixth]

CAIN THE SIXTH: Dere's de fool an' his monument, jest like I said!

[The Gamblers and Cain the Sixth roar with laughter, slap their legs, etc. The members of the main group talk sotto voce to each other as Cain the Sixth catches Zeba's eye. Flatfoot is on her right and is not aware of Cain the Sixth's presence]

NOAH: See how dey makin' out inside, son.

[Stops hammering. Japheth exits into Ark, Noah turns and gazes towards the east]

CAIN THE SIXTH: Hello, honey.

ZEBA: [Frightened but smiling] Hello, sugah.

CAIN THE SIXTH: [Pleasantly] Ain't dat my ol' frien' Flatfoot wid you?

ZEBA: Why, so tis! [Flatfoot is now listening. To Flatfoot] He's got a gun.

CAIN THE SIXTH: No, I ain't.

[He lifts his hands over his head. Zeba quickly advances and runs her hands lightly over his pockets]

ZEBA: [Relieved] I guess he ain't.

CAIN THE SIXTH: No, I ain't got no gun for my ol' frien', Flatfoot.

[He walks up to him]

FLATFOOT: [Smiling] Hi, Cain. How's de boy?

[Cain quickly presses his chest against Flatfoot's, his downstage arm sweeps around Flatfoot's body and his hand goes up to the small of Flatfoot's back]

CAIN THE SIXTH: [Quietly, but triumphantly] I got a little knife fo' him.

[Flatfoot falls dead. The laughter of the others stops and they look at the scene. Zeba for a moment is terrified, her clenched hand pressed to her mouth. She looks at Cain the Sixth, who is smiling at her. He tosses the knife on the ground and holds his hands out to her. She goes to him, smiling]

ZEBA: You sho' take keer of me, honey.

CAIN THE SIXTH: Dat's caize I think yo' wo'th takin' keer of. [To the others] It's all right, folks. I jest had to do a little cleanin' up.

FIRST WOMAN: [Smiling] You is de quickes' scoundrel.

FIRST GAMBLER: It was a nice quick killin'. Who was he?

SECOND WOMAN: [Casually] Dey called him Flatfoot. From over de river. He wa'n't any good. He owed me for washin' for over a year.

THIRD WOMAN: Used to peddle muggles. Said it had a kick like reg'lar snow. Wasn't no good.

SECOND GAMBLER: Think we ought to bury him? FIRST MAN: No, just leave him dere. Nobody comes up yere, 'cept ol' Manatee.

[Indicates Noah, Cries of "Ol" Manatee! Ol' Manatee, dat's good!"]

NOAH: [Still looking off] You bettah pray, you po' chillun. [They all laugh]

FIRST WOMAN: We bettah pray? You bettah pray, Ol' Manatee?

[Laughter again]

NOAH: Dat's what I ain't doin', sinners. Shem! Japheth! [To others, as he points off. Patter of rain] Listen!

CAIN THE SIXTH: [Casually] Doggone, I believe it is gonter shower a little.

FIRST GAMBLER: It do look like rain.

FIRST WOMAN: I think I'll git on home, I got a new dress on.

ZEBA: Me, too. I wants to keep lookin' nice fo' my sweet papa.

[She pats Cain the Sixth's cheek. Cain the Sixth hugs her]

NOAH: [Almost frantically] Ham! Is de animals dere?

HAM: [Off stage] Yes, suh, dere yere. We're comin'.

NOAH: Den bring 'em on.

[Shem and Japheth come on deck with their hammers. The stage begins to darken]

THIRD WOMAN: I guess we all might go home 'til de shower's over. Come on, papa.

SECOND GAMBLER: See you after supper, Noah. [Crowd starts moving off]

NOAH: God's gittin' ready to start, my sons. Let's git dis plankin' done.

ZEBA: Put a big Texas on it, Noah, an' we'll use it fo' excursions.

[There is a distant roll of thunder, there are cries of "Good night, Admiral." "See you later." "So long, Manatee," as the crowd goes off. The thunder rumbles again. There is the sound of increasing rain. The hammers of Shem and Japheth sound louder and are joined by the sounds of other hammerers. There is a flash of lightning. The Choir begins "De Ol' Ark's a-Movering," the sounds on the Ark become faster and louder. The rush of rain grows heavier

NOAH: Hurry! Hurry! Where are you, Ham!

HAM: [Just off stage] Yere I am, Father, wid de animals.

NOAH: God's give us His sign. Send 'em up de gangplank.

[An inclined plane is thrown against the Ark from the side of the stage by Ham, who cracks a whip]

HAM: Get on, dere.

[The heads of two elephants are seen]

NOAH: Bring 'em on board! De Lawd is strikin' down de worl'!

[The singing and the noises reach fortissimo as Ham cracks his whip again, and the rain falls on the stage. The stage is darkened. The Choir continues singing in the darkness]

SCENE X

When the lights go up on the scene, the Ark is at sea. Stationary waves run in front of it. The hillside has disappeared. The Ark is in the only lighted area.

Shem is smoking a pipe on the deck, leaning on the rail. A steamboat whistle blows three short and one long blast. Shem is surprised. In a moment Ham appears, also with a pipe, and joins Shem at the rail.

SHEM: Who'd you think you was signalin'?

HAM: Dat wasn't me, dat was daddy,

SHEM: He think he gonter git a reply?

HAM: I don't know. He's been gittin' a heap of comfort out of dat likker.

SHEM: De kag's nearly empty, ain't it?

HAM: Pretty nearly almos'. [They look over the rail. A pause] Seen anythin'?

SHEM: Dis mornin' I seen somethin' over dere migh'a' been a fish.

HAM: Dat's de big news of de week.

SHEM: How long you think dis trip's gonter las'?

HAM: I don' know! Rain fo'ty days 'n' fo'ty nights an' when dat stop' I thought sho' we'd come up ag'inst a san' bar o' somethin'. Looks now like all dat rain was jest a little incident of de trip. [The whistle blows again] Doggone! I wish he wouldn't do dat. Fust thing we know he'll wake up dem animals ag'in.

[Japheth appears]

SHEM: What's de matter wit' de ol' man, Jape? JAPHETH: Doggone, he say he had a dream dat we're nearly dere. Dat's why he pullin' de whistle cord. See kin he git a' answer. [He looks over the rail] Look to me like de same ol' territory.

[Mrs. Noah appears on deck]

NOAH'S WIFE: You boys go stop yo' paw pullin' dat cord. He so full of likker he think he's in a race.

JAPHETH: He claim he know what he's doin'.

NOAH'S WIFE: I claim he gittin' to be a perfect nuisance. Me an' yo' wives cain't hardly heah ou'sel'es think. [Noah appears, his hat rakishly tilted on his head. He goes to the railing and looks out] You 'spectin' company?

NOAH: Leave me be, woman. De watah don't look so rough to-day. De ol' boat's ridin' easier.

NOAH'S WIFE: Ridin' like a ol' mule!

NOAH: Yes, suh, de air don't feel so wet. Shem! S'pose you sen' out 'nother dove. [Shem goes into the Ark] Ham, go git de soundin' line. Jape, keep yo' eye on de East.

[Japheth goes to the end of the boat]

NOAH'S WIFE: As fo' you, I s'pose you'll help things along by takin' a little drink.

NOAH: Look yere, who's de pilot of dis vessel? NOAH'S WIFE: O' Mister Dumb Luck.

NOAH: Well, see dat's where you don' know anythin'.

NOAH'S WIFE: I s'pose you ain't drunk as a fool?

NOAH: [Cordially] I feel congenial.

NOAH'S WIFE: An' you look it. You look jest wonderful. I wonder if you'd feel so congenial if de Lawd was to show up?

NOAH: De Lawd knows what I'm doin', don' you worry 'bout dat.

NOAH'S WIFE: I wouldn't say anythin' ag'inst de Lawd. He suttinly let us know dey'd be a change in de weather. But I bet even the Lawd wonders sometimes why He ever put you in charge.

NOAH: Well, you let de Lawd worry 'bout dat.

[Shem appears with the dove] SHEM: Will I leave her go, Paw?

NOAH: Leave 'er go. [There's a chorus of "Good Luck, Dove" from the group as the dove flies off stage. Ham appears with the sounding line] Throw 'er over, boy.

[Ham proceeds to do so]

NOAH'S WIFE: An' another thingнам: Неу.

NOAH: [Rushing to his side] What is it?

HAM: Only 'bout a inch! Look!

[They lean over]

JAPHETH: It's gettin' light in de East.

[As Ham works the cord up and down, Noah and Noah's Wife turn toward Japheth. The Choir begins "My Soul Is a Witness for the Lord"]

NOAH: Praise de Lawd, so it is. NOAH'S WIFE: Oh, dat's pretty.

NOAH: [To Ham] An' de boat's stopped. We've landed. Shem, go down 'n' drag de fires an' dreen de boiler. Yo' go help 'im, Ham.

JAPHETH: Look, Paw.

[The dove wings back to the Ark with an olive branch in its mouth]

NOAH: 'N' yere's de little dove wid greenery in its mouth! Take 'er down, Jape, so she kin tell de animals. [Japheth exits after Shem and Ham carrying the dove. To Mrs. Noah] Now, maybe you feel little different.

NOAH'S WIFE: [Contritely] It was jes' gittin' to be so tiresome. I'm sorry, Noah.

NOAH: Dat's all right, oi' woman. [Noah's Wife exits, Noah looks about him. The lights have changed and the water piece is gone and the Ark is again on the hillside. Two mountains can be seen in the distance and a rainbow slowly appears over the Ark. The singing has grown louder] Thank you, Lawd, thank you very much indeed. Amen.

[The singing stops with the "Amen." God appears on the deck]

GOD: Yo' welcome, Noah,

[Noah turns and sees Him] NOAH: O, Lawd, it's wonderful.

GOD: [Looking about Him] I sort of like it. I like de way you handled de ship, too, Noah.

NOAH: Was you watchin', Lawd?

GOD: Every minute. [He smiles] Didn't de ol' lady light into you?

NOAH: [Apologetically] She was kinda restless.

GOD: That's right. I ain't blamin' nobody. I don't even min' you cussin' an' drinkin'. I figure a steamboat cap'n on a long trip like you had has a right to a little redeye, jest so he don' go crazy.

NOAH: Thank you, Lawd. What's de orders now?

GOD: All de animals safe?

NOAH: Dey all fin'n' dandy, Lawd.

GOD: Den I want you to open dat starboard door, an' leave 'em all out. Let 'em go down de hill. Den you an' de family take all de seeds 'n' de sprouts an' begin plantin' ag'in. I'm startin' all over, Noah.

[Noah exits. God looks around]

GOD: Well, now we'll see what happens. [God listens with a smile, as noises accompanying the debarking of the animals are heard. They are the cracks of whips, the voices of the men on the Ark, shouting: "Git along dere." "Whoa, take it easy." "Duck yo' head." "Keep in line dere," etc. Over the Ark there is a burst of centrifugal shadows, and the sound of a myriad of wings. God smiles at the shadows] Dat's right, birds, fin' yo' new homes. [Bird twitters are heard again. God listens a moment and rests an arm on the railing. He speaks softly] Gabriel, kin you spare a minute?

GABRIEL: Yes, Lawd?

[The sounds from the other side of the Ark are by now almost hushed. The Lord indicates the new world with a wave of the hand]

GOD: Well, it's did.

GABRIEL: [Respectfully, but with no enthusiasm] So I take notice.

GOD: Yes, suh, startin' all over again.

GABRIEL: So I see.

GOD: [Looking at him suddenly] Don' seem to set you up much.

GABRIEL: Well, Lawd, you see— [He hesitates] 'Tain't none of my business.

GOD: What?

GABRIEL: I say, I don' know very much about it. GOD: I know you don'. I jest wanted you to see if [A thought strikes Him] Co'se, it ain' yo' business, Gabe. It's my business. 'Twas my idea. De whole thing was my idea. An' every bit of it's my business 'n' nobody else's. De whole thing rests on my shoulders. I declare, I guess dat's why I feel so solemn an' serious, at dis particklar time. You know dis thing's turned into quite a proposition.

GABRIEL: [Tenderly] But it's all right, Lawd, as you say, it's did.

GOD: Yes, suh, it's did. [Sighs deeply. Looks slowly to the right and the left. Then softly] I only hope it's goin' to work out all right.

CURTAIN

PART II. SCENE I.

God's office again.

Somewhere the Choir is singing: "A City Called Heaven." In the office are Two Women Cleaners. One is scrubbing the floor, the other dusting the furniture. The one dusting stops and looks out the window. There is a whirr and a distant faint boom. The Choir stops.

FIRST CLEANER: Dat was a long way off.

SECOND CLEANER: [At window] Yes, ma'am. An' dat must 'a' been a big one. Doggone, de Lawd mus' be mad fo' sho', dis mo'nin'. Dat's de fo'ty-six' thunde'bolt since breakfast.

FIRST CLEANER: I wonder where at He's pitchin' dem.

SECOND CLEANER: My goodness, don' you know? FIRST CLEANER: [A little hurt] Did I know I wouldn't ask de question.

SECOND CLEANER: Every one of dem's bound fo' de earth.

FIRST CLEANER: De earth? You mean dat little ol' dreenin' place?

SECOND CLEANER: Dat's de planet. [Another faint whirr and boom] Dere goes another.

FIRST CLEANER: Well, bless me. I didn't know dey was thunde'bolts.

SECOND CLEANER: Wha'd you think dey was?

FIRST CLEANER: [Above desk] I wasn't sho', but I thought maybe He might be whittlin' a new star o' two, an' de noise was just de chips fallin'.

SECOND CLEANER: Carrie, where you been? Don' you know de earth is de new scandal? Ever'body's talkin' 'bout it.

FIRST CLEANER: Dey kep' it from me.

SECOND CLEANER: Ain't you noticed de Lawd's been unhappy lately?

FIRST CLEANER: [Thoughtfully] Yeah, He ain't been His old self.

SECOND CLEANER: What did you think was de matteh? Lumbago?

FIRST CLEANER: [Petulantly] I didn't know. I didn't think it was fo' me t'inquieh.

SECOND CLEANER: Well, it jest so happens dat de Lawd is riled as kin be by dat measly little earth. Or I should say de scum dat's on it.

FIRST CLEANER: Dat's mankind down dere.

SECOND CLEANER: Dey mus' be scum, too, to git de Lawd so wukked up.

FIRST CLEANER: I s'pose so. [Another whirr and boom] Looks like He's lettin' dem feel de wrath. Ain' dat a shame to plague de Lawd dat way?

SECOND CLEANER: From what I hear dey been beggin' fo' what dey're gittin'. My brother flew down to bring up a saint de other day and he say from what he see mos' of the population down dere has made de debbil king an' dey wukkin' in three shifts fo' him.

FIRST CLEANER: You cain't blame de Lawd.

SECOND CLEANER: Co'se you cain't. Dem human bein's 'd make anybody bile oveh. Ev'rytime de Lawd try to do sompin' fo' dem, doggone if dey don't staht some new ruckus.

FIRST CLEANER: I take notice He's been wukkin' in yere mo' dan usual.

SECOND CLEANER: I wish He'd let us ladies fix it up. Wouldn't take a minute to make dis desk gold-plated.

FIRST CLEANER: I s'pose He likes it dis way. De Lawd's kind o' ol' fashioned in some ways. I s'pose He keeps dis office plain an' simple on purpose.

SECOND CLEANER: [Finishing her work] I don't see why.

FIRST CLEANER: [Looking off] Well, it's kind of a nice place to come to when He's studyin' somethin' impo'tant. 'Most evahthin' else in heaven's so fin' 'n' gran', maybe ev'ry now an' den He jest gits sick an' tired of de glory.

[She is also collecting her utensils]

SECOND CLEANER: Maybe so. Jest de same I'd like to have a free hand wid dis place for a while, so's I could gold it up.

[God appears in the doorway]

FIRST AND SECOND CLEANERS: Good mo'nin', Lawd. We was jest finishin'.

GOD: Go ahead den, daughters.

[Goes to the window]

FIRST AND SECOND CLEANERS: Yes, Lawd. [Exeunt. Off stage] Good mo'nin', Gabriel.

[Off stage Gabriel says, "Good mo'nin', sisters," and enters immediately. He stands in the doorway for a moment watching God—a notebook and pencil in his hand]

GOD: What's de total?

GABRIEL: [Consulting the book] Eighteen thousand nine hund'ed an' sixty for de mo'nin'. Dat's includin' de village wid de fo'tune tellers. Dey certainly kin breed fast.

god: [Solemnly] Dey displease me. Dey displease me greatly.

GABRIEL: Want some more bolts, Lawd?

GOD: [Looking through window] Look at 'em dere. Squirmin' an' fightin' an' bearin' false witness. Listen to dat liar, dere. He don' intend to marry dat little gal. He don' even love her. What did you say?

GABRIEL: Should I git mo' bolts?

GOD: Wait a minute. [He carefully points His finger down through the window] I'm goin' to git dat wicked man myself. [From a great distance comes an agonized cry: "Oh, Lawd!" God turns from the window] No use gittin' mo' thunde'bolts. Dey din' do de trick. [He goes to the swivel chair and sits] It's got to be somethin' else.

GABRIEL: How would it be if you was to doom 'em all ag'in, like dat time you sent down de flood? I bet dat would make dem mind.

god: You see how much good de flood did. Dere dey is, jest as bad as ever.

GABRIEL: How about cleanin' up on de whole mess of 'em and sta'tin' all over ag'in wid some new kind of animal?

GOD: An' admit I'm licked?

GABRIEL: [Ashamedly] No, of co'se not, Lawd.

GOD: No, suh. No, suh. Man is a kind of pet of mine and it ain't right fo' me to give up tryin' to do somethin' wid him. Doggone, mankin' mus' be all right at de core or else why did I ever bother wid him in de first place?

[Sits at desk]

GABRIEL: It's jest dat I hates to see you worryin' about it, Lawd.

GOD: Gabe, dere ain't anythin' worth while anywheres dat didn't cause somebody some worryin'. I ain't never tol' you de trouble I had gittin' things started up yere. Dat's a story in itself. No, suh, de more I keep on bein' de Lawd de more I know I got to keep improvin' things. An' dat takes time and worry. De main trouble wid mankin' is he takes up so much of my time. He ought to be able to help hisself a little. [He stops suddenly and cogitates] Hey, dere! I think I got it!

GABRIEL: [Eagerly] What's de news?

GOD: [Still cogitating] Yes, suh, dat seems like an awful good idea.

GABRIEL: Tell me, Lawd.

GOD: Gabriel, have you noticed dat every now an' den, mankin' turns out some pretty good specimens?

GABRIEL: Dat's de truth.

GOD: Yes, suh. Dey's ol' Abraham and Isaac an' Jacob an' all dat family.

GABRIEL: Dat's so, Lawd.

GOD: An' every one of dem boys was a hard wukker an' a good citizen. We got to admit dat.

GABRIEL: Dey wouldn't be up yere flyin' wid us if dey hadn't been.

GOD: No, suh. An' I don' know but what de answer to de whole trouble is right dere.

GABRIEL: How you mean, Lawd?

GOD: Why, doggone it, de good man is de man dat keeps busy. I mean I been goin' along on de principle dat he was something like you angels—dat you ought to be able to give him somethin' an' den jest let him sit back an' enjoy it. Now dat I recollec' I put de first one down dere to take keer o' dat garden an' den I let him go ahead an' do nothin' but git into mischief. [He rises] Sure, dat's it. He ain't built jest to fool 'roun' an' not do nothin'. Gabe, I'm gonter try a new scheme.

GABRIEL: [Eagerly] What's de scheme, Lawd? GOD: I'll tell you later. Send in Abraham, Isaac an' Jacob. [A voice outside calls: "Right away, Lawd."] You go tell dem to put dem bolts back in de boxes. I ain' gonter use dem ag'in a while.

GABRIEL: O. K., Lawd.

GOD: Was you goin' anywhere near de Big Pit?

GABRIEL: I could go.

GÖD: Lean over de brink and tell Satan he's jest a plain fool if he thinks he kin beat anybody as big as me.

GABRIEL: Yes, suh, Lawd. Den I'll spit right in his eye.

[Gabriel exits. God looks down through the window again to the earth below]

GOD: Dat new polish on de sun makes it powerful hot. [He "r'ar back"] Let it be jest a little bit cooler. [He feels the air] Dat's nice. [Goes to His desk. A knock on the door] Come in.

[Abraham, Isaac and Jacob enter. All are very old men, but the beard of Abraham is the longest and whitest, and they suggest their three generations. They have wings that are not quite so big as those of the native angels]

ISAAC: Sorry we so long comin', Lawd. But Pappy and me had to take de boy [Pointing to Jacob] over to git him a can of wing ointment.

GOD: What was de matter, son?

JACOB: Dey was chafin' me a little. Dey fine now, thank you, Lawd.

GOD: Dat's good. Sit down an' make yo'selves comf'table. [The three sit. Men: "Thank you, Lawd"] Men, I'm goin' to talk about a little scheme I got. It's one dat's goin' to affec' yo fam'lies an' dat's why I 'cided I'd talk it over wid you, 'fo it goes into ee-ffect. I don't know whether you boys know it or not, but you is about de three best men of one fam'ly dat's come up yere since I made little apples. Now I tell you what I'm gonter do. Seein' dat you human bein's cain't 'preciate anythin' lessen you fust wukk to git it and den keep strugglin' to hold it, why I'm gonter turn over a very valuable piece of property to yo' fam'ly, and den see what kin dev do with it. De rest of de worl' kin go jump in de river fo' all I keer. I'm gonter be lookin' out fo' yo' descendants only. Now den, seein' dat you boys know de country pretty tho'ly, where at does you think is de choice piece of property in de whole worl'? Think it over for a minute. I'm gonter let you make the s'lection.

ABRAHAM: If you was to ask me, Lawd, I don't think dey come any better dan de Land of Canaan. GOD: [To Isaac and Iacob] What's yo' feelin' in de matter?

JACOB: [After a nod from Isaac] Pappy an' me think do we get a pick, dat would be it.

GOD: [Goes to window again; looks out] De Land of Canaan. Yes, I guess dat's a likely neighborhood. It's all run over wid Philistines and things right now, but we kin clean dat up. [He turns from the window and resumes His seat] All right. Now who do you boys think is best of yo' men to put in charge down dere? You see I ain't been payin' much attention to anybody in partic'lar lately.

ISAAC: Does you want de brainiest or de holiest, Lawd?

[Men look up]

GOD: I want de holiest. I'll make him brainy.

[Men appreciate the miracle]

ISAAC: [As Abraham and Jacob nod to him] Well, if you want A-Number-One goodness, Lawd, I don't know where you'll git more satisfaction dan in a great-great-great-great-grandson of mine.

GOD: Where's he at?

ISAAC: At de moment I b'lieve he's in de sheep business over in Midian County. He got in a little trouble down in Egypt, but 'twa'n't his doin'. He killed a man dat was abusin' one of our boys in de brick works. Of co'se you know old King Pharaoh's got all our people in bondage.

GOD: I heard of it. [With some ire] Who did you think put them dere? [The visitors lower their heads] It's all right, boys [All rise] I'm gonter take dem out of it. An' I'm gonter turn over de whole Land of Canaan to dem. An' do you know who's gonter lead dem dere? Yo' great, great, great, great-grand-son. Moses, ain't it?

ISAAC: Yes, Lawd.

GOD: [Smiling] Yes. I been noticin' him.

ABRAHAM: It's quite a favor fo' de fam'ly, Lawd. GOD: Dat's why I tol' you. You see, it so happens I love yo' fam'ly, an' I delight to honor it. Dat's all, gen'lemen. [The three others rise and cross to the door, murmuring, "Yes, Lawd," "Thank you, Lawd," "Much obliged, Lawd," etc. The Choir begins, "My Lord's A-Writin' All De Time" pianissimo. God stands watching the men leave] Enjoy yo'selves. [He goes to the window. The singing grows softer. He speaks through the window to the earth] I'm comin' down to see you, Moses, an' dis time my scheme's got to wukk.

[The stage is darkened. The singing grows louder and continues until the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE II.

The tableau curtains frame the opening of a cave, which is dimly lighted. A large turkey-berry bush is somewhere near the foreground. Moses is seated on the grass eating his lunch from a basket in his lap. Zipporah, his wife, stands watching him. He is about forty, Zipporah somewhat younger. They are dressed inconspicuously. Moses stutters slightly when he speaks. He looks up to see Zipporah smiling.

MOSES: What you smilin' at, Zipporah? ZIPPORAH: Caize you enjoyin' yo'self. MOSES: You is a good wife, Zipporah.

ZIPPORAH: You is a good husband, Moses. [Moses wipes his mouth with a handkerchief and begins putting into the basket the various implements of the meal which had been on the ground about him] Why you suppose it's so dark yere today? Dey's no rain in de air.

MOSES: Seems like it's jest aroun' dis cave. Yo' father's house is got de sun on it. [He looks in another direction] Looks all clear down toward Egypt.

ZIPPORAH: Co'se it would be fine weather in Egypt. De sky looks all right. Maybe it's gonter rain jest right yere. Why don't you move de sheep over to de other pasture?

MOSES: [A bit puzzled] I don' know. It got dark like dis befo' you come along wid de dinner an' I was gonter stop you on de top of de hill. Den somethin' kep' me yere.

ZIPPORAH: S'pose it could be de Lawd warnin' you dat dey's 'Gyptians hangin' 'roun'?

Moses: Dey may have fo'gotten all about dat killin' by now. Dey got a new Pharaoh down dere. ZIPPORAH: An' I hear he's jest as mean to yo' people as his pappy was. I wouldn't put it pas' him to send soljahs all the way up yere fo' you,

Moses: Dat's all right. De Lawd's looked after me so far. I don't 'spect him to fall down on me now. You better be gittin' home.

ZIPPORAH: [Taking the basket] I'll be worryin' about you.

MOSES: [Kissing her and then smiling] 'Parently de Lawd ain't. He knows I'm safe as kin be. Lemme see you feel dat way.

ZIPPORAH: You is a good man, Moses.

Moses: I'se a lucky man [Zipporah exits with the basket. Moses looks up at the sky] Dat's funny. De sun seems to be shinin' every place but right yere. It's shinin' on de sheep. Why ain't dey no clouds dere?

GOD: [Off stage] Caize I want it to be like dat, Moses.

Moses: [Looking about him] Who's dat?

GOD: [Off stage again] I'm de Lawd, Moses.

MOSES: [Smiling] Dat's what you say. Dis yere shadow may be de Lawd's wukk, but dat voice soun' pretty much to me like my ol' brother Aaron.

GOD: [Off stage] Den keep yo' eyes open, son. [The turkey-berry bush begins to glow and then turns completely red. Moses looks at it fascinated] Maybe you notice de bush ain't burnin' up.

MOSES: Dat's de truth.

[Moses is full of awe but not frightened]

GOD: [Off stage] Now you believe me? MOSES: Co'se I does. It's wonderful.

[The light in the bush dies and God appears from behind it]

GOD: No, it ain't, Moses. It was jest a trick.

Moses: 'Scuse me doubtin' you, Lawd. I always had de feelin' you wuz takin' keer of me, but I never 'spected you'd fin' time to talk wid me pussunly. [He laughs] Dat was a good trick, Lawd. I'se seen some good ones, but dat was de beatenest.

GOD: Yo' gonter see lots bigger tricks dan dat, Moses. In fac', yo' gonter perfo'm dem.

Moses: [Incredulously] Me? I'm gonter be a tricker?

GOD: Yes, suh.

Moses: An' do magic? Lawd, my mouth ain't got de quick talk to go wid it.

GOD: It'll come to you now.

Moses: [Now cured of stuttering] Is I goin' wid a circus?

GOD: [Slowly and solemnly] Yo' is goin' down into Egypt, Moses, and lead my people out of bondage. To do dat I'm gonter make you de bes' tricker in de worl'.

MOSES: [A little frightened] Egypt! You know I killed a man dere, Lawd. Won't dey kill me?

god: Not when dey see yo' tricks. You ain't skeered, is you?

MOSES: [Simply and bravely] No, suh, Lawd.

son: Den yere's what I'm gonter do. Yo' people is my chillun, Moses. I'm sick and tired o' de way ol' King Pharaoh is treatin' dem, so I'se gonter take dem away, and yo' gonter lead dem. You gonter lead 'em out of Egypt an' across de river Jordan. It's gonter take a long time, and you ain't goin' on no excursion train. Yo' gonter wukk awful hard for somethin' yo' goin' to fin' when de trip's over.

MOSES: What's dat, Lawd?

god: It's de Land of Canaan. It's de bes' land I got. I've promised it to yo' people, an' I'm gonter give it to dem.

Moses: Co'se, ol' King Pharaoh will do everything he kin to stop it.

GOD: Yes, an' dat's where de tricks come in. Dey tell me he's awful fond of tricks.

Moses: I hear dat's all he's fon' of. Dey say if you cain't take a rabbit out of a hat you cain't even git to see him.

GOD: Wait'll you see de tricks you an' me's goin' to show him.

MOSES: [Delightedly] Doggone! Huh, Lawd? GOD: Yes, suh. Now de first trick—

[God is lifting a stick which He carries]

MOSES: Jest a minute, Lawd. [God halts the demonstration] I'm gonter learn de tricks and do just like you tell me, but I know it's gonter take me a little time to learn all dat quick talkin'. Cain't I have my brother Aaron go wid me? He's a good man.

GOD: I was gonter have him help you wid de Exodus. I guess he can watch, too.

MOSES: I'll call 'im.

[He turns as if to shout]

GOD: Wait. [Moses turns and looks at God] I'll bring him. [Softly] Aaron!

[Aaron appears between God and Moses in the mouth of the cave. He is a little taller than Moses and slightly older. He, too, is dressed like a field hand]

AARON: [Blankly] Hey!

[Moses goes to him, takes his hand and leads him, bewildered, down to where Moses had been standing alone. Aaron then sees God]

MOSES: [Almost in a whisper] It's all right.

GOD: Don't worry, son, I'm jest showin' some tricks. Bringin' you yere was one of dem. [Aaron stares at God as if hypnotized] Now den, you see dis yere rod? Looks like a ordinary walking stick, don' it?

MOSES: Yes, Lawd.

gop: Well, it ain't no ordinary walkin' stick, caize look. [Moses leans forward] When I lays it down on de groun'——

[The stage is darkened. The Choir begins, "Go Down, Moses," and continues until the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE III.

The throne room of Pharaoh. It suggests a Negro lodge room. The plain board walls are colored by several large parade banners of varying sizes, colors and materials, bordered with gold fringe and tassels on them. Some of the inscriptions on them read:

SUBLIME ORDER OF PRINCES OF THE HOUSE OF PHARAOH
HOME CHAPTER
MYSTIC BROTHERS OF THE EGYPTIAN
HOME GUARD
LADIES AUXILIARY, NO. I
SUPREME MAGICIANS AND WIZARDS
OF THE UNIVERSE
PRIVATE FLAG OF HIS HONOR
OLD KING PHARAOH
ROYAL YOUNG PEOPLE'S PLEASURE CLUB
ENCHANTED AND INVISIBLE CADETS
OF EGYPT BOYS' BRIGADE

There is one door up right and a window. The throne, an ordinary armchair with a drapery over its back, is on a dais. Pharaoh is seated on the throne. His crown and garments might be those worn by a high officer in a Negro lodge during a ritual. About the throne itself are high officials, several of them with plumed hats, clothing that suggests military uniforms, and rather elaborate sword belts, swords and scabbards. A few soldiers carrying spears are also in his neighborhood and one or two bearded ancients in brightly colored robes with the word "Wizard" on their conical hats. In the general group of men and women scattered elsewhere in the room Sunday finery is noticeable everywhere. Most of the civilians have bright "parade" ribbons and wear medals. In a cleared space immediately before the throne a Candidate Magician is performing a sleight-of-hand trick with cards. Pharaoh watches him apathetically. He is receiving earnest attention from a few of the others, but the majority of the men and women are talking quietly among themselves. Beside the Candidate Magician are several paraphernalia of previously demonstrated tricks.

CANDIDATE MAGICIAN: [Holding up some cards] Now den, ol' King Pharaoh, watch dis. [He completes a trick. There is a murmur of "Not bad," "Pretty good," etc., from a few of the watchers. Pharaoh makes no comment] Now, I believe de cyard I ast you to keep sittin' on was de trey of diamonds, wasn't it?

PHARAOH: Yeah.

CANDIDATE MAGICIAN: Den kin I trouble you to take a look at it now? [Pharaoh half rises to pick up a card he has been sitting on, and looks at it] I believe you'll now notice dat it's de king of clubs? [Pharaoh nods and shows the card to those nearest him. The Candidate Magician waits for an audible approval and gets practically none] An' dat, ol' King Pharaoh, completes de puffohmance.

[An elderly man in a uniform steps forward]
GENERAL: On behalf of my nephew I beg Yo'
Honor to let him jine de ranks of de royal trickers and magicians.

PHARAOHE [To the two Wizards] What do de committee think? [The Wizards shake their heads] Dat's what I thought. He ain't good enough. I'd like to help you out, General, but you know a man's got to be a awful good tricker to git in de royal society dese days. You better go back an' steddy some mo', son. [He lifts his voice and directs two Soldiers guarding the door] Is de head magician reached de royal waitin' room yit? [One of the Soldiers opens the door to look out] If he is, send him in.

[The Soldier beckons to someone off stage, throws the door open, and announces to the court]

SOLDIER: De Head Magician of de land of Egypt.

[A very old and villainous man enters. His costume is covered with cabalistic and zodiacal signs. He advances to the King, the other Magician and his uncle making way for him. He bows curtly to Pharaoh]

HEAD MAGICIAN: Good mo'nin', ol' King Pharaoh. PHARAOH: Mo'nin', Professor. What's de news? HEAD MAGICIAN: Evahthing's bein' carried out like you said.

PHARAOH: How's de killin' of de babies 'mongst de Hebrews comin' 'long?

HEAD MAGICIAN: Jes' like you ordered.

PHARAOH: [Genially] Dey killed all of 'em, huh? HEAD MAGICIAN: Do dey see one, dey kill 'em. You teachin' 'em a great lesson. Dey don't like it a-tall. PHARAOH: [Smiling] What do dey say?

HEAD MAGICIAN: [Pawing the air inarticulately] I hates to tell in front of de ladies.

PHARAOH: Dey feels pretty bad, huh?

HEAD MAGICIAN: Dat's jest de beginnin' of it. Betwixt de poleece and de soljahs we killed about a thousan' of 'em las' night. Dat's purty good.

PHARAOH: [Thoughtfully] Yeh, it's fair. I guess you boys is doin' all you kin. But I fin' I ain't satisfied, though.

HEAD MAGICIAN: How you mean, Yo' Honor?

PHARAOH: I mean I'd like to make dose Hebrew chillun realize dat I kin be even mo' of a pest. I mean I hates dem chillun. An' I'm gonter think of a way of makin' 'em even mo' mizzable.

HEAD MAGICIAN: But dey ain't anythin' meaner dan killin' de babies, King.

PHARAOH: Dey must be sump'n. Doggone, you is my head tricker, you put yo' brains on it. [To the others] Quiet, whilst de Head Magician go into de silence.

HEAD MAGICIAN: [After turning completely around twice, and a moment's cogitation] I tell you what I kin do. All de Hebrews dat ain't out to de buryin' grounds or in de hospitals is laborin' in de brick wukks.

HARAOH: Yeh?

HEAD MAGICIAN: [After a cackling laugh] How would it be to take de straw away from 'em and tell 'em dey's got to turn out jest as many bricks as usual? Ain't dat nasty?

PHARAOH: Purty triflin', but I s'pose it'll have to do for de time bein'. Where's de extreme inner guard? [One of the military Attendants comes forward] Go on out an' tell de sup'intendent to put dat into ee-ffect. [The Attendant bows and starts for the door. He stops as Pharaoh calls to him] Wait a minute! Tell 'im to chop off de hands of anybody dat say he cain't make de bricks dat way. [The Attendant salutes and exits, the door being opened and closed by one of the Soldiers] Now what's de news in de magic line?

HEAD MAGICIAN: I ain't got very many novelties today, King. I been wukkin' too hard on de killin's. I'm so tired I don' believe I could lift a wand.

[There are murmurs of protest from the assemblage]

PHARAOH: Doggone, you was to 'a been de chief feature o' de meetin' dis mo'nin'. Look at de turnout you got account of me tellin' 'em you was comin'.

HEAD MAGICIAN: Well, dat's de way it is, King. Why don' you git de wizards to do some spell castin'?

PHARAOH: Dey say it's in de cyards dat dey cain't wukk till high noon. [He glances at the Wizards] Think mebbe you kin cheat a little?

FIRST WIZARD: Oh, dat cain't be done, King.

PHARAOH: Well, we might as well adjourn, den. Looks to me like de whole program's shot to pieces. [He starts to rise, when there is a furious banging on the door] What's de idea, dere? See who dat is. [The Soldiers open the door. Moses and Aaron enter, pushing the two Soldiers aside and coming down in front of Pharaoh. The Soldiers are bewildered and Pharaoh is angry] Say, who tol' you two baboons you could come in yere?

MOSES: Is you ol' King Pharaoh?

PHARAOH: Dat's me. Did you heah what I asked you?

Moses: My name is Moses, and dis is my brother Aaron.

[Murmur of "Hebrews" spreads through the room]

PHARAOH: [In a rage] Is you Hebrews?

MOSES: Yes, suh.

PHARAOH: [Almost screaming] Put 'em to de sword!

[As the Courtiers approach, Aaron suddenly discloses the rod, which he swings once over his head. The Courtiers draw back as if their hands had been stung. Cries of "Hey!" "Look out," etc.]

MOSES: Keep outside dat circle.

[The Courtiers nearest Moses and Aaron look at each other, exclaiming ad lib., "Did you feel dat?" "What was dat?" "What's goin' on, heah?" "My hands is stingin'!" etc.]

PHARAOH: [Puzzled but threatening] What's de idea yere?

MOSES: We is magicians, ol' King Pharaoh.

PHARAOH: [To the Head Magician] Put a spell on 'em. [The Head Magician stands looking at them, bewildered. To Moses] I got some magicians, too. We'll see who's got de bes' magic. [Moses and Aaron laugh. Most of the Courtiers are cowering. To the Head Magician] Go ahead, give 'em gri-gri.

MOSES: Sure, go ahead.

PHARAOH: Hurry up, dey's laughin' at you. What's de matter?

HEAD MAGICIAN: I cain't think of de right spell. PHARAOH: [Now frightened himself] You mean dey got even you whupped?

HEAD MAGICIAN: Dey's got a new kind of magic. PHARAOH: [Gazes at Head Magician a moment, bewildered. To the Wizards] I s'pose if de Professor cain't, you cain't.

FIRST WIZARD: Dat's a new trick, King.

HEAD MAGICIAN: [Rubbing his fingers along his palms] It's got 'lectricity in it!

PHARAOH: Hm, well dat may make it a little diffrent. So you boys is magicians, too?

MOSES: Yes, suh.

PHARAOH: Well, we's always glad to see some new trickers in de co't, dat is if dey good. [He glances about him] You look like you is O. K.

MOSES: Dat's what we claims, ol' King Pharaoh. We think we's de best in de worl'.

PHARAOH: You certainly kin talk big. Jest what is it you boys would like?

MOSES: We came to show you some tricks. Den we's goin' to ask you to do somethin' for us.

PHARAOH: Well, I s'pose you know I'm a fool for conjurin'. If a man kin show me some tricks I ain't seen, I goes out of my way to do him a favor.

MOSES: Dat's good. Want to see de first trick?

PHARAOH: It ain't goin' to hurt nobody? MOSES: Dis one won't.

PHARAOH: Go ahead.

MOSES: Dis yere rod my brother has looks jes' like a walkin' stick, don't it?

[The Courtiers now join the King in interest] PHARAOH: Uh-huh. Le's see.

[Aaron hands him the rod, which Pharaoh inspects and returns]

Moses: Well, look what happens when he lays it on de groun'.

[Aaron places the rod on the second step of the throne. It turns into a life-like snake. There are exclamations from the assemblage]

PHARAOH: Dat's a good trick! Now turn it back into a walkin' stick again. [Aaron picks it up and it is again a rod. Exclamations of "Purty good!" "Dat's all right!" "What do you think of that!" etc.] Say, you is good trickers!

Moses: You ain't never seen de beat of us. Now I'm goin' to ask de favor.

PHARAOH: Sure, what is it?

MOSES: [Solemnly] Let de Hebrew chillun go!

PHARAOH: [Rises and stares at them. There is a murmur of "Listen to 'im!" "He's got nerve!" "I never in my life!" "My goodness!" etc.] What did you say?

MOSES: Let de Hebrew chillun go.

[Pharaoh seats himself again]

PHARAOH: [Slowly] Don' you know de Hebrews is my slaves?

Moses: Yes, suh.

PHARAOH: Yes, suh, my slaves. [There is a distant groaning] Listen, and you kin hear 'em bein' treated like slaves. [He calls toward the window] What was dey doin' den?

MAN NEAR THE WINDOW: Dey's jest gettin' de news down in de brickyard.

PHARAOH: I won't let them go. [He snorts contemptuously] Let's see another trick.

MOSES: Yes, suh, yere's a better one. [He lowers his head] Let's have a plague of de flies.

[Aaron raises the rod. The room grows dark and a great buzzing of flies is heard. The Courtiers break out in cries of "Get away fum me!" "Take 'em away!" "De place is filled with flies!" "Dis is terrible!" "Do sump'n, Pharaoh!"

PHARAOH: [Topping the others] All right—stop de trick!

MOSES: Will you let de Hebrews go? PHARAOH: Sho' I will. Go ahead, stop it! MOSES: [Also above the others] Begone!

[The buzzing stops and the room is filled with light again, as Aaron lowers the rod. All except Moses and Aaron are brushing the flies from their persons]

PHARAOH: [Laughing] Doggone, dat was a good trick! [The others, seeing they are uninjured, join in the laughter, with exclamations of "Doggone!" "You all right?" "Sho' I'm all right." "Didn't hurt me," etc.] You is good trickers.

MOSES: Will you let de Hebrew chillun go?

PHARAOH: [Sitting down again] Well, I'll tell you, boys. I'll tell you sump'n you didn' know. You take me, I'm a pretty good tricker, an' I jest outtricked you. So, bein' de bes' tricker, I don' think I will let 'em go. You got any mo' tricks yo'self?

MOSES: Yes, suh. Dis is a little harder one. [Aaron lifts the rod] Gnats in de mill pon', gnats in de clover, gnats in de 'tater patch, stingin' all over.

[The stage grows dark again. There is the humming of gnats and the slapping of hands against faces and arms, and the same protests as were heard with the flies, but with more feeling: "I'm gittin' stung to death!" "I'm all stung!" "Dey're like hornets!" "Dey's on my face!" etc.]

PHARAOH: Take 'em away, Moses!

MOSES: [His voice drowning the others] If I do, will you let 'em go?

PHARAOH: Sho' I will, dis time.

MOSES: Do you mean it?

PHARAOH: Co'se I mean it! Doggone, one just stang me on de nose.

MOSES: Begone! [Lights come up as Aaron lowers the rod. There is a moment of general recovery again. Pharaoh rubs his nose, looks at his hands, etc., as do the others] Now, how about it?

PHARAOH: [Smiling] Well, I'll tell you, Moses. Now dat de trick's over——

[Moses takes a step toward Pharaoh]

Moses: Listen, Pharaoh. You been lyin' to me, and I'm gittin' tired of it.

PHARAOH: I ain't lyin', I'm trickin', too. You been trickin' me and I been trickin' you.

Moses: I see. Well, I got one mo' trick up my sleeve which I didn't aim to wukk unless I had to. Caize when I does it, I cain't undo it.

PHARAOH: Wukk it an' I'll trick you right back. I don' say you ain't a good tricker, Moses. You is one of de best I ever seen. But I kin outtrick you. Dat's all.

MOSES: It ain't only me dat's goin' to wukk dis trick. It's me an' de Lawd.

PHARAOH: Who?

Moses: De Lawd God of Israel.

PHARAOH: I kin outtrick you an' de Lawd too!

MOSES: [Angrily] Now you done it, ol' King Pharaoh. You been mean to de Lawd's people, and de Lawd's been easy on you caize you didn' know better. You been givin' me a lot of say-so and no do-so, and I didn' min' dat. But now you've got to braggin' dat you's better dan de Lawd, and dat's too many.

PHARAOH: You talk like a preacher, an' I never did like to hear preachers talk.

MOSES: You ain't goin' to like it any better, when I strikes down de oldes' boy in every one of 'yo' people's houses.

PHARAOH: Now, you've given up trickin' and is jest lyin'. [He rises] Listen, I'm Pharaoh. I do de strikin' down yere. I strike down my enemies, and dere's no one in all Egypt kin kill who he wants to, 'ceptin' me.

MOSES: I'm sorry, Pharaoh. Will you let de Hebrews go?

PHARAOH: You heard my word. [Aaron is lifting his rod again at a signal from Moses] Now, no more tricks or I'll----

Moses: Oh, Lawd, you'll have to do it, I guess. Aaron, lift de rod.

[There is a thunderclap, darkness and screams. The lights go up. Several of the younger men on the stage have fallen to the ground or are being held in the arms of the horrified elders] PHARAOH: What have you done yere? Where's my boy?

[Through the door come four men bearing a young man's body]

FIRST OF THE FOUR MEN: King Pharaoh.

[Pharaoh drops into his chair, stunned, as the dead boy is brought to the throne]

PHARAOH: [Grief-stricken] Oh, my son, my fine son.

[The Courtiers look at him with mute appeal] Moses: I'm sorry, Pharaoh, but you cain't fight de Lawd. Will you let his people go?

PHARAOH: Let dem go.

[The lights go out. The Choir begins, "Mary, Don't You Weep," and continues until it is broken by the strains of "I'm Noways Weary and I'm Noways Tired." The latter is sung by many more voices than the former, and the cacophony ends as the latter grows in volume and the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE IV.

The Children of Israel are marching on the treadmill and now singing fortissimo. They are of all ages and most of them are ragged. The men have packs on their shoulders, one or two have hand carts. The line stretches across the stage. It is nearing twilight, and the faces of the assemblage are illumined by the rays of the late afternoon sun. The upper treadmill carries a gradually rising and falling middle distance past the marchers. The foot of a mountain appears; a trumpet call is heard as the foot of the mountain reaches stage center. The marchers halt. The picture now shows the mountain running up out of sight off right. The singing stops. A babel of "What's de matter?" "Why do we stop?" "'Tain't sundown yet!" "What's happened?" "What's goin' on?" "What are they blowin' for?" etc. Those looking ahead begin to murmur. "It's Moses," "Moses," "What's happened to him?" The others take up the repetition of "Moses," and Moses enters, on the arm of Aaron. He is now an old man, as is his brother, and he totters toward the center of the stage. Cries of "What's de matter, Moses?" "You ain't hurt, is you?" "Ain't that too bad?" etc. He slowly seats himself on the rock at the foot of the mountain.

AARON: How you feelin' now, brother?

Moses: I'm so weary, Aaron. Seems like I was took all of a sudden.

AARON: Do we camp yere?

Moses: [Pathetically] No, you got to keep goin'.

AARON: But you cain't go no further tonight, brother.

MOSES: Dis never happened to me befo'.

A YOUNG WOMAN: But you's a oi' man, now, Father Moses. You cain't expect to go as fas' as we kin.

Moses: But de Lawd said I'd do it. He said I was to show you de Promised Land. Fo'ty years, I bin leadin' you. I led you out o' Egypt. I led you past Sinai, and through de wilderness. Oh, I cain't fall down on you now.

AARON: Le's res' yere fo' de night. Den we'll see how you feel in de mo'nin'.

MOSES: We tol' de scouts we'd meet 'em three miles further on. I hate fo' 'em to come back all dis way to report. 'Tis gettin' a little dark, ain't it?

AARON: It ain't dark, brother. MOSES: No, it's my eyes. AARON: Maybe it's de dust.

MOSES: No, I jest cain't seem to see. Oh, Lawd, dey cain't have a blind man leadin' 'em! Where is you, Aaron?

AARON: I'se right yere, Moses.

Moses: Do you think— [Pause] Oh! Do you think it's de time He said?

AARON: How you mean, Moses?

[Crowd looks from one to another in wonder]
MOSES: He said I could lead 'em to de Jordan, dat I'd see de Promised Land, and dat's all de further I could go, on account I broke de laws.
Little while back I thought I did see a river ahead, and a pretty land on de other side. [Distant shouts
"Hooray!" "Yere dey are!" "Dey traveled quick," etc.] Where's de young leader of de troops? Where's Joshua?

[The call "Joshua" is taken up by those on the right of the stage, followed almost immediately by "Yere he is!" "Moses wants you!" etc. Joshua enters. He is a fine-looking Negro of about thirty]

JOSHUA: [Going to Moses' side] Yes, suh. Moses: What's de shoutin' 'bout, Joshua?

JOSHUA: De scouts is back wid de news. De Jordan is right ahead of us, and Jericho is jest on de other side. Moses, we're dere! [There are cries of "Hallelujah!" "De Lawd be praised!" "Hooray!" "De Kingdom's comin'!" etc. With a considerable stir among the marchers, several new arrivals crowd in from right, shouting "Moses, we're dere!" Joshua, seeing the newcomers] Yere's de scouts.

[Three very ragged and dusty young men advance to Moses]

Moses: [As the shouting dies] So it's de river Jordan?

FIRST SCOUT: Yes, suh.

MOSES: All we got to take is de city of Jericho. FIRST SCOUT: Yes, suh.

Moses: Joshua, you got to take charge of de fightin' men, an' Aaron's gotta stay by de priests.

JOSHUA: What about you?

Moses: You are leavin' me behind. Joshua, you gonter get de fightin' men together and take dat city befo' sundown.

JOSHUA: It's a big city, Moses, wid walls all 'round it. We ain't got enough men.

MOSES: You'll take it, Joshua. JOSHUA: Yes, suh, but how?

Moses: Move up to de walls wid our people. Tell de priests to go wid you with de rams' horns. You start marchin' 'roun' dem walls, and den—

JOSHUA: Yes, suh.

MOSES: De Lawd'll take charge, jest as He's took charge ev'y time I've led you against a city. He ain't never failed, has He?

SEVERAL VOICES: No, Moses. [All raise their heads]

Moses: And He ain't goin' to fail us now. [He prays. All bow] Oh, Lawd, I'm turnin' over our brave young men to you, caize I know you don' want me to lead 'em any further. [Rises] Jest like you said, I've got to de Jordan but I cain't git over it. An' yere dey goin' now to take de city of Jericho. In a little while dey'll be marchin' 'roun' it. An' would you please be so good as to tell 'em what to do? Amen. [To Joshua] Go ahead. Ev'ybody follows Joshua now. Give de signal to move on wid ev'ything. [A trumpet is heard] You camp fo' de night in de city of Jericho.

[Moses seats himself on the rock] JOSHUA: Cain't we help you, Moses?

moses: You go ahead. De Lawd's got his plans fo' me. Soun' de signal to march. [Another trumpet call is heard. The company starts marching off. Aaron lingers a moment] Take care of de Ark of de Covenant, Aaron.

AARON: Yes, brother. Goodbye.

Moses: Goodbye, Aaron. [The singing is resumed softly and dies away. The last of the marchers has disappeared] Yere I is, Lawd. De chillun is goin' into de Promised Land. [God enters from behind the hill. He walks to Moses, puts His hands on his shoulders] You's with me, ain't you, Lawd?

GOD: Co'se I is.

*MOSES: Guess I'm through, Lawd. Jest like you said I'd be, when I broke de tablets of de law. De ol' machine broke down.

god: Jest what was it I said to you, Moses? Do you remember?

Moses: You said I couldn't go into de Promised Land.

GOD: Dat's so. But dat ain't all dey was to it.

MOSES: How you mean, Lawd?

gool: Moses, you been a good man. You been a good leader of my people. You got me angry once, dat's true. And when you anger me I'm a God of Wrath. But I never meant you wasn't gonter have what was comin' to you. An' I ain't goin' to do you out of it, Moses. It's jest de country acrost de river dat you ain't gonter enter. You gonter have a Promised Land. I been gettin' it ready fo' you, fo' a long time. Kin you stand up?

MOSES: [Rising, with God's help] Yes, suh, Lawd. GOD: Come on, I'm goin' to show it to you. We goin' up this hill to see it. Moses, it's a million times nicer dan de Land of Canaan.

[They start up the hill] MOSES: I cain't hardly see.

GOD: Don't worry. Dat's jest caize you so old.

[They take a step or two up the hill, when

Moses stops suddenly]

MOSES: Oh!

GOD: What's de matter?
MOSES: We cain't be doin' dis!

GOD: Co'se we kin!

Moses: But I fo'got! I fo'got about Joshua and de fightin' men!

GOD: How about 'em?

MOSES: Dey're marchin' on Jericho. I tol' 'em to march aroun' de walls and den de Lawd would be dere to tell 'em what to do.

GOD: Dat's all right. He's dere.

MOSES: Den who's dis helpin' me up de hill?

god: Yo' faith, yo' God.

Moses: And is you over dere helpin' dem too, Lawd? Is you goin' to tell dem poor chillun what to do?

GOD: Co'se I is. Listen, Moses. I'll show you how I'm helpin' dem.

[From the distance comes the blast of the rams' horns, the sound of crumbling walls, a roar, and a moment's silence. The Choir begins "Joshua Fit de Battle of Jericho" and continues through the rest of the scene]

Moses: You did it, Lawd! You've tooken it! Listen to de chillun'—dey's in de Land of Canaan at last! You's de only God dey ever was, ain't you, Lawd?

GOD: [Quietly] Come on, ol' man.

[They continue up the hill. The stage is darkened]

MR. DESHEE: [In the dark] But even dat scheme didn' work. Caize after dey got into the Land of Canaan dey went to de dogs again. And dey went into bondage again. Only dis time it was in de city of Babylon.

[The Choir, which has been singing "Cain't Stay Away," stops as the next scene begins]

SCENE V.

Under a low ceiling is a room vaguely resembling a Negro night club in New Orleans. Two or three long tables run across the room, and on the left is a table on a dais with a gaudy canopy above it. The table bears a card marked "Reserved for King and guests."

Flashy young men and women are seated at the tables. About a dozen couples are dancing in the foreground to the tune of a jazz orchestra. The costumes are what would be worn at a Negro masquerade to represent the debauchees of Babylon.

FIRST MAN: When did yuh git to Babylon?

SECOND MAN: I jes' got in yesterday.

THIRD MAN: [Dancing] How do you like dis baby, Joe?

FOURTH MAN: Hot damn! She could be de King's pet!

A WOMAN: Anybody seen my papa?

THIRD MAN: Don' fo'git de dance at de High Priest's home to-morrow.

[The dance stops as a bugle call is heard. Enter Master of Ceremonies]

MASTER OF CEREMONIES: Stop! To-night's guest of honor, de King of Babylon, an' party of five.

[Enter the King and five girls. The King has on an imitation ermine cloak over his conventional clothes and wears a diamond tiara. All rise as the King enters, and sing, "Hail, de King of Bab—Bab—Babylon"]

KING: Wait till you see de swell table I got. [He crosses the stage to his table. The girls are jabbering] Remind me to send you a peck of rubies in de mo'nin'.

MASTER OF CEREMONIES: Ev'nin', King! KING: Good ev'nin'. How's de party goin'?

MASTER OF CEREMONIES: Bes' one we ever had in Babylon, King.

KING: Any Jew boys yere?

MASTER OF CEREMONIES: [Indicating some of the others] Lot o' dem yere. I kin go git mo' if you want 'em.

KING: I was really referrin' to de High Priest. He's a 'tic'lar frien' o' mine an' he might drop in. You know what he look like?

MASTER OF CEREMONIES: No, suh, but I'll be on de look-out fo' him.

KING: O.K. Now le's have a li'l good time.

MASTER OF CEREMONIES: Yes, suh. [To the or-chestra] Let 'er go, boys.

[The music begins, waiters appear with food and great urns painted gold and silver, from which they pour out wine for the guests. The Master of Ceremonies exits. The King's dancing-girls go to the middle of the floor, and start to dance. The King puts his arms about the waists of two girls, and draws them to him]

KING: Hot damn! Da's de way! Let de Jew boys see our gals kin dance better'n deirs. [There is an ad lib. babel of "Da's de truth, King!" "I don't know—we got some good gals, too!" etc.] Dey ain' nobody in de worl' like Babylon gals.

[The dancing grows faster, the watchers keep time with handclaps. The door at the left opens suddenly, and the Prophet, a patriarchal, ragged figure, enters. He looks belligerently about the room, and is followed almost immediately by the Master of Ceremonies]

PROPHET: Stop!

[The music and the dancers halt]

KING: What's the idea, bustin' up my party?

MASTER OF CEREMONIES: He said he was expected, King. I thought mebbe he was de-

KING: Did you think he was de High Priest of de Hebrews? Why, he's jest an' ol' bum! Throw dis ol' bum out o' yere! De High Priest is a fashion plate. Throw dis ol' bum out o' yere!

PROPHET: Stop!

[Those who have been advancing to seize him stop, somewhat amused]

KING: Wait a minute. Don't throw him out. Let's see what he has to say.

PROPHET: Listen to me, King of Babylon! I've been sent yere by de Lawd God Jehovah. Don't you dare lay a hand on de Prophet!

KING: Oh, you're a prophet, is yuh? Well, you know we don't keer much fo' prophets in dis part of de country.

PROPHET: Listen to me, sons and daughters of Babylon! Listen, you children of Israel dat's given yo'selves over to de evil ways of yo' oppressors! You're all wallowin' like hogs in sin, an' de wrath of God ain' goin' to be held back much longer! I'm tellin' you, repent befo' it's too late. Repent befo' Jehovah casts down de same fire dat burned up Sodom and Gomorrah. Repent befo' de——

[During this scene yells increase as the Prophet continues. The High Priest enters left. He is a fat voluptuary, elaborately clothed in brightly colored robes. He walks in hand in hand with a gaudily dressed chippy]

HIGH PRIEST: [Noise stops] Whoa, dere! What you botherin' the King fo'?

PROPHET: [Wheeling] And you, de High Priest of all Israel, walkin' de town wid a dirty li'l tramp.

KING: Seems to be a frien' o' yours, Jake.

HIGH PRIEST: [Crossing to the King with his girl] Aw, he's one of dem wild men, like Jeremiah and Isaiah. Don' let him bother you none.

[Pushes Prophet aside and goes to King's table]
PROPHET: You consort with harlots, an' yo' pollution in the sight of the Lawd. De Lawd God's goin' to smite you down, jest as he's goin' to smite down all dis wicked world!

[Grabs High Priest and turns him around]

KING: [Angrily against the last part of the preceding speech] Wait a minute. I'm getting tired of this. Don' throw him out. Jest kill him!

[There is the sound of a shot. The Prophet falls]

II, v

PROPHET: Smite 'em down, Lawd, like you said. Dey ain't a decent person left in de whole world.

[He dies. The Master of Ceremonies, revolver in hand, looks down at the Prophet]

MASTER OF CEREMONIES: He's dead, King.

KING: Some of you boys take him out.

[A couple of young men come from the background and walk off with the body]

HIGH PRIEST: Don' know whether you should'a done that, King.

KING: Why not?

HIGH PRIEST: I don' know whether de Lawd would like it.

KING: Now, listen, Jake. You know yo' Lawd ain't payin' much attention to dis man's town. Except fo' you boys, it's tho'ly protected by de Gods o' Babylon.

HIGH PRIEST: I know, but jest de same-

KING: Look yere, s'pose I give you a couple hund'ed pieces of silver. Don' you s'pose you kin arrange to persuade yo God to keep his hands off?

HIGH PRIEST: [Oilily] Well of co'se we could try.

I dunno how well it would work.

[As the High Priest speaks, the King claps his hands. Master of Ceremonies enters with bag of money]

KING: Yere it is.

HIGH PRIEST: [Smiling] I guess we kin square things up. [He prays—whiningly] Oh Lawd, please forgive my po' frien' de King o' Babylon. He didn't know what he was doin' an'——

[There is a clap of thunder, darkness for a second. The lights go up and God is standing in the center of the room]

GOD: [In a voice of doom] Dat's about enough. [The guests are horrified] I'se stood all I kin from you. I tried to make dis a good earth. I helped Adam, I helped Noah, I helped Moses, an' I helped David. What's de grain dat grew out of de seed? Sin! Nothin' but sin throughout de whole world. I've given you ev'y chance. I sent you warriors and prophets. I've given you laws and commandments, an' you betrayed my trust. Ev'ything I've given you, you've defiled. Ev'y time I've fo'given you, you've mocked me. An' now de High Priest of Israel tries to trifle wid my name. Listen, you chillun of darkness, yo' Lawd is tired. I'm tired of de struggle to make you worthy of de breath I gave you. I put you in bondage ag'in to cure you an' yo' worse dan you was amongst de flesh pots of Egypt. So I renounce you. Listen to the words of yo' Lawd God Jehovah, for dey is de last words yo' ever hear from me. I repent of dese people dat I have made and I will deliver dem no more.

[There is darkness and cries of "Mercy!" "Have pity, Lawd!" "We didn' mean it, Lawd!"

"Forgive us, Lawd?" etc. The Choir sings "Death's Gwinter Lay His Cold Icy Hands on Me" until the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE VI.

God is writing at His desk. Outside, past the door, goes Hosea, a dignified old man, with wings like Jacob's. God, sensing his presence, looks up from the paper He is examining, and follows him out of the corner of His eye. Angrily He resumes His work as soon as Hosea is out of sight. There is a knock on the door.

GOD: Who is it?
[Gabriel enters]

GABRIEL: It's de delegation, Lawd.

GOD: [Wearily] Tell 'em to come in. [Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses enter] Good mo'nin', gen'lemen.

THE VISITORS: Good mo'nin', Lawd. GOD: What kin I do for you?

Moses: You know, Lawd. Go back to our people. GOD: [Shaking His head] Ev'ry day fo' hund'eds of years you boys have come in to ask dat same thing. De answer is still de same. I repented of de people I made. I said I would deliver dem no more. Good mo'nin', gen'lemen. [The four visitors rise and exeunt. Gabriel remains] Gabe, why do dey do it?

GABRIEL: I 'spect dey think you gonter change yo' mind.

GOD: [Sadly] Dey don' know me. [Hosea again passes the door. His shadow shows on wall. Gabriel is perplexed, as he watches. God again looks surreptitiously over His shoulder at the passing figure] I don' like dat, either.

GABRIEL: What, Lawd?

GOD: Dat man.

GABRIEL: He's just a prophet, Lawd. Dat's jest old Hosea. He jest come up the other day.

GOD: I know. He's one of de few dat's come up yere since I was on de earth last time.

GABRIEL: Ain' been annoyin' you, has he?

GOD: I don' like him walkin' past de door.

GABRIEL: All you got to do is tell him to stop, Lawd.

GOD: Yes, I know. I don' want to tell him. He's got a right up yere or he wouldn' be yere.

GABRIEL: You needn' be bothered by him hangin' aroun' de office all de time. I'll tell 'im. Who's he think he-

GOD: No, Gabe. I find it ain't in me to stop him. I sometimes jest wonder why he don' jest come in an' say hello.

GABRIEL: You want him to do that?
[He moves as if to go to the door]

GOD: He never has spoke to me, and if he don't wanta come in, I ain't gonter make him. But dat ain't de worst of it, Gabriel.

GABRIEL: What is, Lawd?

gop: Ev'y time he goes past de door I hears a voice.

GABRIEL: One of de angels?

GOD: [Shaking His head] It's from de earth. It's a man.

GABRIEL: You mean he's prayin'?

GOD: No, he ain't exactly prayin'. He's jest talkin' in such a way dat I got to lissen. His name is Hezdrel.

GABRIEL: Is he on de books?

GOD: No, not yet. But ev'y time dat Hosea goes past I hear dat voice.

GABRIEL: Den tell it to stop.

god: I find I don' want to do that, either. Dey's gettin' ready to take Jerusalem down dere. Dat was my big fine city. Dis Hezdrel, he's jest one of de defenders. [Suddenly and passionately, almost wildly] I ain't comin' down. You hear me? I ain't comin' down. [He looks at Gabriel] Go ahead, Gabriel. 'Tend to yo' chores. I'm gonter keep wukkin' yere.

GABRIEL: I hates to see you feelin' like dis, Lawd. GOD: Dat's all right. Even bein' God ain't a bed of roses. [Gabriel exits. Hosea's shadow is on the wall. For a second Hosea hesitates. God looks at the wall. Goes to window] I hear you. I know yo' fightin' bravely, but I ain't comin' down. Oh, why don' you leave me alone? You know you ain't talkin' to me. Is you talkin' to me? I cain't stand yo' talkin' dat way. I kin only hear part of what yo' sayin', and it puzzles me. Don' you know you cain't puzzle God? [A pause. Then, tenderly] Do you want me to come down dere ve'y much? You know I said I wouldn't come down? [Fiercely] Why don' he answer me a little? [With clenched fists, looks down through the window] Listen! I'll tell you what I'll do. I ain't goin' to promise you anythin', and I ain't goin' to do nothin' to help you. I'm jest feelin' a little low, an' I'm only comin down to make myself feel a little better, dat's all.

[The stage is darkened. Choir begins "A Blind Man Stood in de Middle of de Road," and continues until the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE VII.

It is a shadowed corner beside the walls of the temple in Jerusalem. The light of camp fires flickers on the figure of Hezdrel, who was Adam in Part I. He stands in the same position Adam held when first discovered but in his right hand is a sword, and his left is in a sling. Around him are several prostrate bodies. Pistol and cannon shots, then a trumpet call. Six young men enter from left in command of a Corporal. They are all armed.

CORPORAL: De fightin' stopped fo' de night, Hezdrel.

HEZDREL: Yes?

CORPORAL: Dey're goin' to begin ag'in at cockcrow. [Man enters, crosses the stage and exits] Herod say he's goin' to take de temple to-morrow, burn de books and de Ark of de Covenant, and put us all to de sword.

HEZDREL: Yo' ready, ain't you? EVERYBODY: Yes, Hezdrel.

HEZDREL: Did de food get in through the hole in de city wall?

[Two Soldiers enter, cross the stage and exeunt] CORPORAL: Yessuh, we's goin' back to pass it out now.

HEZDREL: Good. Any mo' of our people escape to-day?

CORPORAL: Ol' Herod's got de ol' hole covered up now, but fifteen of our people got out a new one we made.

[Other Soldiers enter, cross the stage and exeunt]

HEZDREL: Good. Take dese yere wounded men back and git 'em took care of.

CORPORAL: Yes, suh.

[They pick up the bodies on the ground and carry them off stage as Hezdrel speaks]

HEZDREL: So dey gonter take de temple in de mo'nin'? We'll be waitin' for 'em. Jest remember, boys, when dey kill us we leap out of our skins, right into de lap of God.

[The Men disappear with the wounded; from the deep shadow upstage comes God]

GOD: Hello, Hezdrel-Adam.

HEZDREL: [Rubbing his forehead] Who is you? GOD: Me? I'm jest an ol' preacher, from back in de hills.

HEZDREL: What you doin' yere?

GOD: I heard you boys was fightin'. I jest wanted to see how it was goin'.

HEZDREL: Well, it ain't goin' so well. GOD: Dey got you skeered, huh?

HEZDREL: Look yere, who is you, a spy in my brain?

GOD: Cain't you see I'se one of yo' people?

HEZDREL: Listen, Preacher, we ain't skeered. We's gonter be killed, but we ain't skeered.

GOD: I'se glad to hear dat. Kin I ask you a question, Hezdrel?

HEZDREL: What is it?

GOD: How is it you is so brave?

HEZDREL: Caize we got faith, dat's why.

GOD: Faith? In who?

HEZDREL: In our dear Lawd God.

GOD: But God say he abandoned ev'y one down yere.

HEZDREL: Who say dat? Who dare say dat of de Lawd God of Hosea?

gop: De God of Hosea?

HEZDREL: You heard me. Look yere, you is a spy in my brain!

GOD: No, I ain't, Hezdrel, I'm jest puzzled. You ought to know dat.

HEZDREL: How come you so puzzled 'bout de God of Hosea?

GOD: I don't know. Maybe I jest don' hear things. You see, I live 'way back in de hills.

HEZDREL: What you wanter find out?

GOD: Ain't de God of Hosea de same Jehovah dat was de God of Moses?

HEZDREL: [Contemptuously] No. Dat ol' God of wrath and vengeance? We have de God dat Hosea preached to us. He's de one God.

gop: Who's he?

HEZDREL: [Reverently] De God of mercy.

gop: Hezdrel, don' you think dey must be de same God?

HEZDREL: I don' know. I ain't bothered to think much about it. Maybe dey is. Maybe our God is de same ol' God. I guess He jest got tired of His appearance dat ol' way.

GOD: What you mean, Hezdrel?

HEZDREL: Oh, dat ol' God dat walked de earth in de shape of a man. I guess he lived with man so much dat all he seen was de sins in man. Dat's what made him de God of wrath and vengeance. Co'se he made Hosea. An' Hosea never would a found what mercy was unless dere was a little of it in God, too. Anyway, he ain't a fearsome God no mo'. Hosea showed us dat.

GOD: How you s'pose Hosea found dat mercy?
HEZDREL: De only way he could find it. De only way I found it. De only way anyone could find it.
GOD: How's dat?

HEZDREL: Through sufferin'.

GOD: [After a pause] What if dey kill you in de mo'nin', Hezdrel?

HEZDREL: If dey do, dey do. Dat's all.

GOD: Herod say he's goin' to burn de temple—HEZDREL: So he say.

GOD: And burn de Ark an' de books. Den dat's de end of de books, ain't it?

HEZDREL: [Buoyantly] What you mean? If he burns dem things in dere? Naw. Dem's jest copies. GOD: Where is de others?

HEZDREL: [Tapping his head] Dey's a set in yere. Fifteen got out through de hole in the city wall to-day. A hundred and fifty got out durin' de week. Each of 'em is a set of de books. Dey's scattered safe all over de countryside now, jest waitin' to git pen and paper fo' to put 'em down ag'in.

GOD: [Proudly] Dey cain't lick you, kin dey, Hezdrel?

HEZDREL: [Smiling] I know dey cain't. [Trumpet] You better get out o' yere, Preacher, if you wanter carry de news to yo' people. It'll soon be daylight.

GOD: I'm goin'. [He takes a step upstage and stops] Want me to take any message?

HEZDREL: Tell de people in de hills dey ain't nobody like de Lawd God of Hosea.

GOD: I will; if dey kill you to-morrow I'll bet dat God of Hosea'll be waitin' for you.

HEZDREL: I know he will.

GOD: [Quietly] Thank you, Hezdrel.

HEZDREL: Fo' what?

GOD: Fo' tellin' me so much. You see, I been so far away, I guess I was jest way behin' de times.

[He exits. Pause, then trumpet sounds. Hezdrel paces back and forth once or twice. Another young Soldier appears. Other men enter and stand grouped about Hezdrel]

SECOND OFFICER: [Excitedly] De cock's jest crowed, Hezdrel. Dey started de fightin' ag'in.

HEZDREL: We's ready for 'em. Come on, boys. [From the darkness upstage comes another group of soldiers] Dis is de day dey say dey'll git us. Le's fight till de last man goes. What d'you say?

CORPORAL: Le's go, Hezdrel!

HEZDREL: [Calling left] Give 'em ev'ything boys! [There is a movement toward the left, a bugle call and the sound of distant battle. The lights go out. The Choir is heard singing, "March On," triumphantly. They continue to sing after the lights go up on the next scene]

SCENE VIII.

It is the same setting as the Fish Fry Scene in Part I. The same angels are present but the Choir, instead of marching, is standing in a double row on an angle upstage right. God is seated in an armchair near center. He faces the audience. As the Choir continues to sing, Gabriel enters, unnoticed by the chattering angels. He looks at God, who is staring thoughtfully toward the audience.

GABRIEL: You look a little pensive, Lawd. [God nods his head] Have a seegar, Lawd?

GOD: No, thanks, Gabriel.

[Gabriel goes to the table, accepts a cup of custard; chats with the angel behind the table for a moment as he sips, puts the cup down and returns to the side of God]

GABRIEL: You look awful pensive, Lawd. You been sittin' yere, lookin' dis way, an awful long time. Is it somethin' serious, Lawd?

GOD: Very serious, Gabriel.

GABRIEL: [Awed by His tone] Lawd, is de time come for me to blow?

GOD: Not yet, Gabriel. I'm just thinkin'.

GABRIEL: What about, Lawd?

[Puts up hand. Singing stops]

GOD: 'Bout somethin' de boy tol' me. Somethin' 'bout Hosea, and himself. How dey foun' somethin'. GABRIEL: What, Lawd?

GOD: Mercy. [A pause] Through sufferin', he said. GABRIEL: Yes, Lawd.

GOD: I'm tryin' to find it, too. It's awful impo'tant. It's awful impo'tant to all de people on my earth. Did he mean dat even God must suffer?

[God continues to look out over the audience for a moment and then a look of surprise comes into His face. He sighs. In the distance a voice cries]

THE VOICE: Oh, look at him! Oh, look, dey goin to make him carry it up dat high hill! Dey goin' to nail him to it! Oh, dat's a terrible burden for one man to carry!

[God rises and murmurs "Yes!" as if in recognition. The heavenly beings have been watching Him closely, and now, seeing Him smile gently, draw back, relieved. All the angels burst into "Hallelujah, King Jesus." God continues to smile as the lights fade away. The singing becomes fortissimo]

CURTAIN

Thornton Wilder

Thornton Niven Wilder has the double distinction of being a successful novelist and an original dramatist. His two important full-length playsthe Pulitzer Prize drama Our Town and The Skin of Our Teeth-reflect the theme of all Wilder's major writing-man in the universe. He belongs to the select few who have managed to restore the primacy of imagination to the drama in a completely modern idiom.

Born in Madison, Wisconsin, Wilder spent part of his childhood in China, returning to the United States to complete his high-school education. His college studies were interrupted by his service in the Coast Artillery Corps in the First World War, but he returned to complete them and then spent a graduate year studying archaeology at the American Academy in Rome. During and after his further graduate work at Princeton, he taught at the Lawrenceville School. From 1930 to 1936 he was a member of the faculty of the University of Chicago. In the Second World War he served with the Air Forces Intelligence in North Africa and Italy.

Because of his broad knowledge of European culture, Wilder was called upon by producers to adapt to the stage various foreign works, and his literary activities have won awards for him not only in the United States but from other countries as well.

It was as a novelist that Wilder first won recognition. He received high praise for The Cabala (1925) and was awarded a Pulitzer Prize for his philosophical novel The Bridge of San Luis Rey (1927). Subsequently, he wrote The Woman of Andros (1930) and Heaven's My Destination (1935). Much later, after winning success in the theatre, he proved that he was still adept at writing noteworthy fiction, with his semi-Shavian story of Julius Caesar, The Ides of March (1948).

Wilder's career in the theatre started inauspiciously with a play called The Trumpet Shall Sound, which Richard Boleslavsky's Laboratory Theatre produced in New York in 1926. Wilder then brought out two collections of one-act plays, The Angel That Troubled the Waters (1928) and The Long Christmas Dinner (1931). Some of these one-acters are notable as early examples of Wilder's interest in the everyday events of simple life and of his fondness for nonrealistic styles of play construction. In 1932, he adapted André Obey's Lucrece for Katherine Cornell.

It was rather late in his career that Wilder made his special impression on the theatre. In 1938, in addition to adapting a German play, The Merchant of Yonkers, which failed on Broadway, he made theatrical history with Our Town. This play received a brilliant production on a bare stage from the volatile genius of the American theatre Jed Harris; it had for its chief actor the lovable performer Frank Craven, who played the Narrator. Our Town enjoyed a long run on Broadway, toured widely, and has been a favorite production in the little theatres throughout the United States. In 1942, Wilder startled playgoers with a uniquely stylized drama, The Skin of Our Teeth, which telescoped human history in the story of a New Jersey suburban family. Although it did not succeed as well as Our Town, The Skin of Our Teeth made a deep impression. It was the profoundest commentary on the Second World War crisis of which the American theatre proved capable. In 1948, Wilder's adaptation of a play by Sartre, The Victors, received an experimental production. But it was not written in Wilder's characteristic vein, and it throws no light on the nonrealistic dramatic art for which he will be remembered.

Our Town is generally regarded as one of the best examples of stylized dramaturgy developed by an American. From a historical point of view, it is, in fact, an example of a style better represented by the artistry of stage designers and directors than by the work of playwrights. From 1910 on, reports of miraculous productions had been drifting to the United States from the Continent. In these productions, the style of the stagecraft called attention to the nonrepresentational or "theatrical" nature of stage art. Theatre was treated frankly as theatre and not as a means of creating an illusion of reality. "Theatricalism" had effective proponents abroad, such as Max Reinhardt before and Eugene Vakhtangov and Vsevolod Meyerhold after the First World War. Vakhtangov, for example, styled his production of the Jewish folk drama The Dybbuk for the Habimah troupe with expressive rather than realistic stage settings, with dance rhythms, and with conspicuously theatrical acting. Also, he attracted considerable attention by staging Gozzi's Italian classic Princess Turandot in the Chinese convention. Property men appeared in full view of the audience. shifted scenes in front of the playgoer, and discoursed among themselves, even making commentary on the action.

With theatricalism, directors restored the connection between the stage and the auditorium, or between the actor and the spectator, that had existed in the days of the platform and the apron stage, before the realistic, peepshow type of theatre had erected the fourth-wall convention. The play written for theatricalism was so constructed as to present a view of life rather than a literal copy of it, which is what realism tries and pretends to provide. The actor might costume himself in public, frankly set the scene for his demonstration of an idea or situation, address the spectator, and in all respects communicate with the audience. It is for this nonrealistic presentation, instead of representation, of life that the writer Alexander Bakshy invented the term "presentational" theatre. In America, before Our Town, we had had such theatricalist plays as John Howard Lawson's jazz symphony of American life Processional (1924) and Eva Le Gallienne's Alice in Wonderland (1933).

Our Town is nonillusionistic, presentational drama. The principal actor is the "stage manager." He sets up his demonstration, calling for skeletal or fragmentary stage settings to help the audience visualize a particular situation; he plays the part of a philosophical druggist who has had many occasions to observe the town's characters; and he acts as host, master of ceremonies, commentator, philosopher, and friend to the spectators. He takes them into his confidence and proceeds to communicate to them his knowledge of the little town of Grover's Corners and its people, along with his thoughts about living and dying. In form, Our Town achieves, in short, a significant presentation or, as Gordon Craig would have said, "a noble artificiality."

Locating Our Town historically and explaining its style is, however, less important than experiencing the play. Once we become acquainted with a dramatic style, it rapidly loses novelty and ceases to have any value apart from the life and feeling it conveys. The formal structure calls to mind the scaffolding on a building in the process of construction. The important question is: what sort of building is arising behind the wooden platforms? The theatricalist form of Our Town enables the author to build the kind of play he wants to give us—an informal, intimate, and compellingly human drama. It is a work of love and of wisdom: it pulsates with Wilder's love for the New England environment and way of life and for life itself; and it is pervaded by a wisdom about these things that is as down to earth as the life which the author chronicles.

The content of the play is so simple that it is momentous, for it deals primarily with the life in life. Hence Wilder can dismiss all topical issues and situations from his demonstration after briefly noting that they appear in Grover's Corners, as they do everywhere else. Grover's Corners is a little town in New Hampshire, and it can be located by latitude and longitude. But it is all places, and it is located in the universe. Nothing sums up the essence of Wilder's philosophy in Our Town better than the address on a letter sent to a Grover's Corners' girl by a humorist who, to Wilder, was probably unknowingly the profoundest person in the world: "June Crofut, the Crofut Farm, Grover's Corners, Sultan County, New Hampshire, United States of America, Continent of North America, Western Hemisphere, the Earth, the Solar System, the Universe, the Mind of God."

Without this comprehensive view, Our Town would have to be set down as a broken play, with one part concerned with life and the other with death, or with one part presenting "reality" and the other retailing fantasy, or "metaphysics." For Wilder, however, the two parts are one. The dying gives significance to the living, and the "metaphysical" is included in the "real." "The mind of God" idea may remind us of transcendentalism or Emersonianism so characteristic of New England-the concept that everything is interpenetrated by spirit. But it is homespun philosophy that Wilder's informal presentation gives us, and it serves such simple ends as making us treasure ordinary life just as it is and reminding us to live it to the full before our day is over. "There go all of us," Brooks Atkinson has expressed the meaning of the play, "not 'but for the grace of God,' but 'by the grace of God.' " The play deals ever so unostentatiously, as Atkinson has said, with "the days and deaths of the brotherhood of man." Wilder's cultivated and sophisticated mind reduces our human complexity to its irreducible simplicity.

OUR TOWN

By Thornton Wilder

ACT I.

No curtain. No scenery. The audience, arriving, sees an empty stage in half-light. Presently the Stage Manager, hat on and pipe in mouth, enters and begins placing a table and several chairs down stage left, and a table and chairs down stage right. "Left" and "right" are from the point of view of the actor facing the audience. "Up" is towards the back wall. As the house lights go down he has finished setting the stage and leaning against the right proscenium pillar watches the late arrivals in the audience. When the auditorium is in complete darkness he speaks:

STAGE MANAGER: This play is called "Our Town." It was written by Thornton Wilder, produced and directed by A....; [or: produced by A....; directed by B....]. In it you will see Miss C....; Miss D....; Miss E....; and Mr. F....; Mr. G....; Mr. H....; and many others. The name of the town is Grover's Corners, New Hampshire, just across the Massachusetts line: longitude 42 degrees 40 minutes; latitude 70 degrees 37 minutes. The First Act shows a day in our town. The day is May 7, 1901. The time is just before dawn. [A rooster crows] The sky is beginning to show some streaks of light over in the East there, behind our mount'in. The morning star always gets wonderful bright the minute before it has to go. [He stares at it for a moment, then goes up stage] Well, I'd better show you how our town lies. Up here—[That is: parallel with the back wall is Main Street. Way back there is the railway station; tracks go that way. Polish Town's across the tracks and some Canuck families. [Toward the left] Over there is the Congregational Church; across the street's the Presbyterian. Methodist and Unitarian are over there. Baptist is down in the holla' by the river. Catholic Church is over beyond the tracks. Here's the Town Hall and Post Office combined; jail's in the basement. Bryan once made a speech from these steps here. Along here's a row of stores. Hitching-posts and horse blocks in front of them. First automobile's going to come along in about five years, belonged to Banker Cartwright, our richest citizen . . . lives in the big white house up on the hill. Here's the grocery store and here's Mr. Morgan's drugstore. Most everybody in town manages to look into those two stores once a day. Public School's over yonder. High School's still farther over. Quarter of nine mornings, noontimes, and three o'clock afternoons, the hull town can hear the yelling and screaming from those schoolyards. [He approaches the table and chairs down stage right] This is our doctor's house,-Doc Gibbs'. This is the back door. [Two arched trellises are pushed out, one by each proscenium pillar] There's some scenery for those who think they have to have scenery. There's a garden here. Corn . . . peas . . . beans . . . hollyhocks . . . heliotrope . . . and a lot of burdock. [Crosses the stage] In those days our newspaper come out twice a week,—the Grover's Corners Sentinel,—and this is Editor Webb's house. And this is Mrs. Webb's garden. Just like Mrs. Gibbs's, only it's got a lot of sunflowers, too. Right here,—big butternut tree. [He returns to his place by the right proscenium pillar and looks at the audience for a minute] Nice town, y'know what I mean? Nobody very remarkable ever come out of it,—s'far as we know. The earliest tombstones in the cemetery up there on the mountain say 1670-1680—they're Grovers and Cartwrights and Gibbses and Herseys-same names as are around here now. Well, as I said: it's about dawn. The only lights on in town are in a cottage over by the tracks where a Polish mother's just had twins. And in the Joe Crowell house, where Joe Junior's getting up so as to deliver the paper. And in the depot, where Shorty Hawkins is gettin' ready to flag the 5:45 for Boston. [A train whistle is heard, The Stage Manager takes out his watch and nods Naturally, out in the country-all around-they've been lights on for some time, what with milkin's and so on. But town people sleep late. So-another day's begun. There's Doc Gibbs comin' down Main Street now, comin' back from that baby case. And here's his wife comin' downstairs to get breakfast. Doc Gibbs died in 1930. The new hospital's named after him. Mrs. Gibbs died first-long time ago in fact. She went out to visit her daughter, Rebecca, who married an insurance man in Canton, Ohio, and died there-pneumonia-but her body was brought back here. She's up in the cemetery there now-in with a whole mess of Gibbses and Herseys -she was Julia Hersey 'fore she married Doc Gibbs in the Congregational Church over there. In our town we like to know the facts about everybody. -That's Doc Gibbs. And there comes Joe Crowell, Jr., delivering Mr. Webb's Sentinel.

[Dr. Gibbs has been coming along Main Street from the left. At the point where he would turn to approach his house, he stops, sets down his—imaginary—black bag, takes off his hat, and rubs his face with fatigue, using an enormous handkerchief. Mrs. Gibbs has entered her kitchen, gone through the motions of putting wood into a stove, lighting it, and preparing breakfast. Suddenly, Joe Crowell, Jr., starts down Main Street from the right, hurling imaginary newspapers into doorways]

JOE CROWELL, JR.: Morning, Doc Gibbs.

DR. GIBBS: Morning, Joe.

JOE CROWELL, JR.: Somebody been sick, Doc? DR. GIBBS: No. Just some twins born over in Polish Town.

JOE CROWELL, JR.: Do you want your paper now? DR. GIBBS: Yes, I'll take it.—Anything serious goin' on in the world since Wednesday?

JOE CROWELL, JR.: Yessir. My schoolteacher, Miss Foster, 's getting married to a fella over in Concord. DR. GIBBS: I declare.—How do you boys feel about that?

JOE CROWELL, JR.: Well, of course, it's none of my business,—but I think if a person starts out to be a teacher, she ought to stay one.

DR. GIBBS: How's your knee, Joe?

JOE CROWELL, JR.: Fine, Doc, I never think about it at all. Only like you said, it always tells me when it's going to rain.

DR. GIBBS: What's it telling you today? Goin' to rain?

JOE CROWELL, JR.: No, sir.

DR. GIBBS: Sure?

JOE CROWELL, JR.: Yessir.

DR. GIBBS: Knee ever make a mistake?

JOE CROWELL, JR.: No, sir. [Joe goes off. Dr. Gibbs stands reading his paper]

STAGE MANAGER: Here comes Howie Newsome delivering the milk.

[Howie Newsome comes along Main Street, passes Doctor Gibbs, comes down the center of the stage, leaves some bottles at Mrs. Webb's back door, and crosses the stage to Mrs. Gibbs's]

HOWIE NEWSOME: Git-ap, Bessie. What's the matter with you?—Morning, Doc.

DR. GIBBS: Morning, Howie.

HOWIE NEWSOME: Somebody sick?

DR. GIBBS: Pair of twins over to Mrs. Goruslaw-ski's.

HOWIE NEWSOME: Twins, eh? This town's gettin' bigger every year.

DR. GIBBS: Going to rain, Howie?

HOWIE NEWSOME: No, no. Fine day—that'll burn through. Come on, Bessie.

DR. GIBBS: Hello Bessie. [He strokes her] How old is she, Howie?

mixed up about the route ever since the Lockharts stopped takin' their quart of milk every day. She wants to leave 'em a quart just the same—keeps scolding me the hull trip. [He reaches Mrs. Gibbs's back door. She is waiting for him]

MRS. GIBBS: Good morning, Howie.

HOWIE NEWSOME: Morning, Mrs. Gibbs. Doc's just comin' down the street.

MRS. GIBBS: Is he? Seems like you're late today? HOWIE NEWSOME: Yes. Somep'n went wrong with the separator. Don't know what 'twas. [He goes back to Main Street, clucks for Bessie and goes off right. Dr. Gibbs reaches his home and goes in]

MRS. GIBBS: Everything all right?

DR. GIBBS: Yes. I declare—easy as kittens.

MRS. GIBBS: Bacon'll be ready in a minute. Set down and drink your coffee. Child-run! Child-run! Time to get up.—George! Rebecca!—You can catch a couple hours' sleep this morning, can't you?

DR. GIBBS: Hm! . . . Mrs. Wentworth's coming at eleven. Guess I know what it's about, too. Her stummick ain't what it ought to be.

MRS. GIBBS: All told, you won't get more'n three hours' sleep. Frank Gibbs, I don't know what's goin' to become of you. I do wish I could get you to go away some place and take a rest. I think it would do you good.

MRS. WEBB: Emileeee! Time to get up! Wally! Seven o'clock!

MRS. GIBBS: I declare, you got to speak to George. Seems like something's come over him lately. He's no help to me at all. I can't even get him to cut me some wood.

DR. GIBBS: Is he sassy to you?

MRS. GIBBS: No. He just whines! All he thinks about is that baseball—George! Rebecca! You'll be late for school.

DR. GIBBS: M-m-m. . . .

MRS. GIBBS: George!

DR. GIBBS: George, look sharp!

GEORGE'S VOICE: Yes, Pa!

DR. GIBBS: [As he goes off the stage] Don't you hear your mother calling you?

MRS. WEBB: Walleee! Emileee! You'll be late for school! Walleee! You wash yourself good or I'll come up and do it myself.

REBECCA GIBBS'S VOICE: Ma! What dress shall I wear?

MRS. GIBBS: Don't make a noise. Your father's been out all night and needs his sleep. I washed and ironed the blue gingham for you special.

REBECCA: Ma, I hate that dress.

MRS. GIBBS: Oh, hush-up-with-you.

REBECCA: Every day I go to school dressed like a sick turkey.

MRS. GIBBS: Now, Rebecca, don't be impossible. You always look very nice.

REBECCA: Mama, George's throwing soap at me. MRS. GIBBS: I'll come up and slap the both of you,—that's what I'll do.

[A factory whistle sounds. The children enter and take their places at the breakfast tables: Emily and Wally Webb; George and Rebecca Gibbs]

STAGE MANAGER: We've got a factory in our town too,—hear it? Makes blankets. Cartwrights own it and it brung 'em a fortune.

MRS. WEBB: Children! Now I won't have it. Breakfast is just as good as any other meal and I won't have you gobbling like wolves. It'll stunt your growth,—that's a fact. Put away your book, Wally.

WALLY: Aw, Ma!

MRS. WEBB: You know the rule's well as I do—no books at table. As for me, I'd rather have my children healthy than bright.

EMILY: I'm both, Mama: you know I am. I'm the brightest girl in school for my age. I have a wonderful memory.

MRS. WEBB: Eat your breakfast.

WALLY: I'm bright, too, when I'm looking at my stamp collection.

MRS. GIBBS: I'll speak to your father about it when he's rested. Seems to me twenty-five cents a week's enough for a boy your age. I declare I don't know how you spend it all.

GEORGE: Aw, Ma,—I gotta lotta things to buy.

MRS. GIBBS: Strawberry phosphates—that's what you spend it on.

GEORGE: I don't see how Rebecca comes to have so much money. She has more'n a dollar.

REBECCA: [Spoon in mouth, dreamily] I've been saving it up gradual.

MRS. GIBBS: Well, dear, I think it's a good thing every now and then to spend some.

REBECCA: Mama, do you know what I love most in the world—do you?—Money.

MRS. GIBBS: Eat your breakfast.

[The school bell is heard]

THE CHILDREN: Mama, there's the first bell.—I gotta hurry.—I don't want any more.

MRS. WEBB: Walk fast, but you don't have to run. Wally, pull up your pants at the knee. Stand up straight, Emily.

MRS. GIBBS: Tell Miss Foster I send her my best congratulations—can you remember that?

REBECCA: Yes, Ma.

MRS. GIBBS: You look real nice, Rebecca. Pick up your feet.

ALL: Good-by. [The children from the two houses join at the center of the stage and go up to Main Street, then off left. Mrs. Gibbs fills her apron with food for the chickens and comes down to the footlights]

MRS. GIBBS: Here, chick, chick, chick. No, go away, you. Go away. Here, chick, chick, chick. What's the matter with you? Fight, fight, fight,—that's all you do. Hm...you don't belong to me. Where'd you come from? [She shakes her apron] Oh, don't be so scared. Nobody's going to hurt you.

[Mrs. Webb is sitting by her trellis, stringing beans]

MRS. GIBBS: Good morning, Myrtle. How's your cold?

MRS. WEBB: Well, it's better; but I told Charles I didn't know as I'd go to choir practice tonight. Wouldn't be any use.

MRS. GIBBS: Just the same, you come to choir practice. Myrtle, and try it.

MRS. WEBB: Well, if I don't feel any worse than I do now I probably will. While I'm resting myself I thought I'd string some of these beans.

MRS. GIBBS: [Rolling up her sleeves as she crosses the stage for a chat] Let me help you. Beans have been good this year.

MRS. WEBB: I've decided to put up forty quarts if it kills me. The children say they hate 'em but I notice they're able to get 'em down all winter. [Pause]

MRS. GIBBS: Now, Myrtle, I've got to tell you something, because if I don't tell somebody I'll burst.

MRS. WEBB: Why, Julia Gibbs!

MRS. GIBBS: Here, give me some more of those beans. Myrtle, did one of those second-hand furniture men from Boston come to see you last Friday?

MRS. WEBB: No-o.

MRS. GIBBS: Well, he called on me. First I thought he was a patient wantin' to see Dr. Gibbs. 'N he wormed his way into my parlor, and, Myrtle Webb, he offered me three hundred and fifty dollars for Grandmother Wentworth's highboy, as I'm sitting here!

MRS. WEBB: Why, Julia Gibbs!

MRS. GIBBS: He did! That old thing! Why, it was so big I didn't know where to put it and I almost give it to Cousin Hester Wilcox.

MRS. WEBB: Well, you're going to take it, aren't you?

MRS. GIBBS: I don't know.

MRS. WEBB: You don't know—three hundred and fifty dollars. What's come over you?

MRS. GIBBS: Well, if I could get the Doctor to take the money and go away some place on a real trip I'd sell it like that.—Myrtle, ever since I was that high I've had the thought that I'd like to see Paris, France. I suppose I'm crazy.

MRS. WEBB: Oh, I know what you mean.—How does the Doctor feel about it?

MRS. GIBBS: Well, I did beat about the bush a little and said that if I got a legacy—that's the way I put it—I'd make him take me somewhere.

MRS. WEBB: M-m-m. . . . What did he say?

MRS. GIBBS: You know how he is. I haven't heard a serious word out of him, ever since I've known him. No, he said, it might make him discontented with Grover's Corners to go traipsin' about Europe; better let well enough alone, he says. Every two years he makes a trip to the battlefields of the Civil War and that's enough treat for anybody, he says.

MRS. WEBB: Well, Mr. Webb just admires the way Dr. Gibbs knows everything about the Civil War. Mr. Webb's a good mind to give up Napoleon and move over to the Civil War, only Dr. Gibbs being one of the greatest experts in the country just makes him despair.

MRS. GIBBS: It's a fact! Doctor Gibbs is never so happy as when he's at Antietam or Gettysburg. The times I've walked over those hills, Myrtle, stopping at every bush and pacing it all out, like we was going to buy it.

MRS. WEBB: Well, if that second-hand man's really serious about buyin' it, Julia, you sell it. And then you'll get to see Paris, all right.

MRS. GIBBS: Oh, I'm sorry I mentioned it. Only it seems to me that once in your life before you die you ought to see a country where they don't talk and think in English and don't even want to.

[The Stage Manager returns to the center of the stage]

stage Manager: That'll do. That'll do. Thank you very much, ladies. [Mrs. Gibbs and Mrs. Webb gather up their things, return into their homes and disappear] Now we're going to skip a few hours in the day at Grover's Corners. But before we go on I want you to know some more things about the town,—all kinds of things. So I've asked Prof. Willard of our State University to come down here and sketch in a few details of our past history,—kind of scientific account, you might say. Is Prof. Willard here? [Prof. Willard, a rural savant, pince-nez on a wide satin ribbon, enters from the right with some notes in his hand] May I introduce Prof. Willard of our University. A few brief notes, thank you, Professor,—unfortunately our time is limited.

PROF. WILLARD: Grover's Corners . . . let me see . . . Grover's Corners lies on the old Archaeozoic granite of the Appalachian range. I may say it's some of the oldest land in the world. We're very proud of that. A shelf of Devonian basalt crosses it with vestiges of Mesozoic shale, and some sand-stone outcroppings; but that's all more recent: two hundred, three hundred million years old. Some highly interesting fossils have been found. . . . I may say: unique fossils . . . two miles out of town, in Silas Peckham's cow pasture. They can be seen at the museum in our University at any time. Did you wish the meteorological conditions?

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you. We would.

PROF. WILLARD: The mean precipitation is 40 inches. The mean annual temperature is 43 degrees, ranging between 102 degrees in the shade, and 38 degrees below zero in winter. The . . . the . . . uh . . .

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you, Professor. And have you Prof. Gruber's notes on the history of human life here?

PROF. WILLARD: Hm... yes... anthropological data: Early Amerindian stock. Cotahatchee tribes... no evidence before the Tenth Century of this era... hm... now entirely disappeared... possible traces in three families. Migration toward the end of the Seventeenth Century of English brachycephalic blue-eyed stock... for the most part. Since then some influx of Slav and Mediterranean types....

STAGE MANAGER: And the population, Prof. Willard?

PROF. WILLARD: Within the town limits: 2,640.

The postal district brings in 507 more. Mortality and birth-rates are constant; by MacPherson's gauge: 6.032.

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you very much, Professor. We're all very much obliged to you, I'm sure. PROF. WILLARD: Not at all, sir; not at all.

STAGE MANAGER: This way, Professor, and thank you again. [Exit Prof. Willard] Now the political and social report: Editor Webb.—Oh, Mr. Webb?

[Mrs. Webb appears at her back door]

MRS. WEBB: He'll be here in a minute. . . . He just cut his hand while he was eatin' an apple.

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you, Mrs. Webb.

MRS. WEBB: Charles! Everybody's waitin'. [Exit Mrs. Webb]

STAGE MANAGER: Mr. Webb is Publisher and Editor of The Grover's Corners Sentinel. That's our local paper, y'know.

[Mr. Webb enters from his house, pulling on his coat. His finger is bound in a handkerchief]

MR. WEBB: Hm.... I don't have to tell you that we're run here by a Board of Selectmen.—All males vote at the age of 21. Women vote indirect. We're lower middle-class, sprinkling of professional men ... 10% illiterate laborers. Politically, we're 86% Republicans; 6% Democrats; 4% Socialists; rest, indifferent. Religiously, we're 85% Protestants; 12% Catholics; rest, indifferent. Do you want the poverty and insanity statistics?

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you, no. Have you any comments, Mr. Webb?

MR. WEBB: Very ordinary town, if you ask me. Little better behaved than most. Probably a lot duller. But our young people here seem to like it well enough: 90% of 'em graduating from High School settle down right here to live—even when they've been away to college.

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you, Mr. Webb. Now, is there anyone in the audience who would like to ask Editor Webb anything about the town?

WOMAN IN THE BALCONY: Is there much drinking in Grover's Corners?

MR. WEBB: Well, ma'am, I wouldn't know what you'd call much. Sattidy nights the farmhands meet down in Ellery Greenough's stable and holler some. Fourth of July I've been known to taste a drop myself—and Decoration Day, of course. We've got one or two town drunks, but they're always having remorses every time an evangelist comes to town. No, ma'am, I'd say likker ain't a regular thing in the home here, except in the medicine chest. Right good for snake-bite, y'know—always was.

TALL MAN AT BACK OF AUDITORIUM: Is there no one in town aware of—STAGE MANAGER: Come forward, will you, where we can all hear you— What were you saying?

TALL MAN: Is there no one in town aware of social injustice and industrial inequality?

MR. WEBB: Oh, yes, everybody is,—somethin' terrible. Seems like they spend most of their time talking about who's rich and who's poor.

TALL MAN: Then why don't they do something about it?

MR. WEBB: Well, we're ready to listen to everybody's suggestion as to how you can see that the diligent and sensible 'll rise to the top and the lazy and quarrelsome sink to the bottom. We'll listen to anybody. Meantime until that's settled, we try to take care of those that can't help themselves, and those that can we leave alone.—Are there any more questions?

LADY IN A BOX: Oh, Mr. Webb? Mr. Webb, is there any culture or love of beauty in Grover's Corners?

MR. WEBB: Well, ma'am, there ain't much-not in the sense you mean. Come to think of it, there's some girls that play the piano at High School Commencement; but they ain't happy about it. Yes, and I see where my daughter's been made to read "The Merchant of Venice" over to the school. Seems all pretty remote to 'em, y'know what I mean. No, ma'am, there isn't much culture; but maybe this is the place to tell you that we've got a lot of pleasures of a kind here: we like the sun comin' up over the mountain in the morning, and we all notice a good deal about the birds. We pay a lot of attention to them, and trees and plants. And we watch the change of the seasons: yes, everybody knows about them. But those other things—you're right, ma'am there ain't much—"Robinson Crusoe" and the Bible; and Handel's "Largo," we all know that; and Whistler's "Mother"—those are just about as far as we

LADY IN A BOX: So I thought. Thank you, Mr. Webb.

STAGE MANAGER: All right! All right! Thank you, everybody. [Mr. Webb retires] We'll go back to the town now. It's middle of the afternoon. All 2,642 have had their dinners and all the dishes have been washed. There's an early afternoon calm in our town: a buzzin' and a hummin' from the school buildings; only a few buggies on Main Street—the horses dozing at the hitching-posts; you all remember what it's like. Doc Gibbs is in his office, tapping people and making them say "ah." Mr. Webb's cuttin' his lawn over there; one man in ten thinks it's a privilege to push his own lawn mower. No, sir. It's later than I thought. There are the children coming home from school already.

[Emily Webb comes sedately down Main Street carrying some school books. There are some signs that she is imagining herself to be a lady of striking elegance. Her father's movements to and fro with the lawn mower bring him into her vicinity]

EMILY: I can't, Lois. I've got to go home and help my mother. I promised.

MR. WEBB: Emily, walk simply. Who do you think you are today?

EMILY: Papa, you're terrible. One minute you tell me to stand up straight and the next minute you call me names. I just don't listen to you. [She gives him an abrupt kiss]

MR. WEBB: Golly, I never got a kiss from such a great lady before. [He goes out of sight. Emily leans over and picks some flowers by the gate of her house. George Gibbs comes carecning down Main Street. He is throwing a ball up to dizzying heights, and waiting to catch it again. This sometimes requires his taking six steps backward]

GEORGE: Excuse me, Mrs. Forrest.

STAGE MANAGER (as MRS. FORREST): Go out and play in the fields. young man. You got no business playing baseball on Main Street.

GEORGE: Awfully sorry, Mrs. Forrest.—Hello, Emily.

EMILY: H'lo.

GEORGE: You made a fine speech in class.

EMILY: Well . . . I was really ready to make a speech about the Monroe Doctrine, but at the last minute Miss Corcoran made me talk about the Louisiana Purchase instead. I worked an awful long time on both of them.

GEORGE: Gee, it's funny, Emily. From my window up there I can just see your head nights when you're doing your homework over in your room.

EMILY: Why, can you?

GEORGE: You certainly do stick to it, Emily. I don't see how you can sit still that long. I guess you like school.

EMILY: Well, I always feel it's something you have to go through.

GEORGE: Yeah.

EMILY: I don't mind it really. It passes the time. GEORGE: Yeah.—Emily, what do you think? We might work out a kinda telegraph from there to there; and once in a while you could give me a kinda hint or two about one of those Algebra problems. I don't mean the answers, Emily, of course not . . . just some little hint. . . .

EMILY: Oh, I think hints are allowed.—So-ah—if you get stuck, George, you whistle to me; and I'll give you some hints.

GEORGE: Emily, you're just naturally bright, I guess,

EMILY: I figure that it's just the way a person's born.

GEORGE: Yeah. But, you see, I want to be a farmer, and my Uncle Luke says whenever I'm ready I can come over and work on his farm and if I'm any good I can just gradually have it.

EMILY: You mean the house and everything? [Enter Mrs. Webb]

GEORGE: Yeah. Well, thanks . . . I better be getting out to the baseball field. Thanks for the talk, Emily.—Good afternoon, Mrs. Webb.

MRS. WEBB: Good afternoon, George.

GEORGE: So-long, Emily. EMILY: So-long, George.

MRS. WEBB: Emily, come and help me string these beans for the winter. George Gibbs let himself have a real conversation, didn't he? Why, he's growing up. How old would George be?

EMILY: I don't know.

MRS. WEBB: Let's see. He must be almost six-

EMILY: Mama, I made a speech in class today and I was very good.

MRS. WEBB: You must recite it to your father at supper. What was it about?

EMILY: The Louisiana Purchase. It was like silk off a spool. I'm going to make speeches all my life.

—Mama, are these big enough?

MRS. WEBB: Try and get them a little bigger if you can.

EMILY: Mama, will you answer me a question, serious?

MRS. WEBB: Seriously, dear—not serious.

EMILY: Seriously,—will you?

MRS. WEBB: Of course, I will.

EMILY: Mama, am I good-looking?

MRS. WEBB: Yes, of course you are. All my children have got good features; I'd be ashamed if they hadn't.

EMILY: Oh, Mama, that's not what I mean. What I mean is: am I pretty?

MRS. WEBB: I've already told you, yes. Now that's enough of that. You have a nice young pretty face. I never heard of such foolishness.

EMILY: Oh, Mama, you never tell us the truth about anything.

MRS. WEBB: I am telling you the truth.

EMILY: Mama, were you pretty?

MRS. WEBB: Yes, I was, if I do say it. I was the prettiest girl in town next to Mamie Cartwright.

EMILY: But, Mama, you've got to say something about me. Am I pretty enough . . . to get anybody . . . to get people interested in me?

MRS. WEBB: Emily, you make me tired. Now stop it. You're pretty enough for all normal purposes. Come along now and bring that bowl with you.

EMILY: Oh, Mama, you're no help at all.

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you. Thank you! That'll do. We'll have to interrupt again here. Thank you, Mrs. Webb; thank you, Emily. [Mrs. Webb and Emily withdraw There are some more things we've got to explore about this town. This time we're going to go about it in another way: we're going to look back on it from the future. I'm not going to tell you what became of these two families we're seeing most of, because the rest of the play will tell you about them. But take some of these others: Take Joe Crowell, Jr.: Joe was a very bright fellow. He graduated with honors and got a scholarship to Boston Tech.,—M.I.T., that is. But the War broke out and Joe died in France. All that education for nothing. Howie Newsome's still delivering milk at Grover's Corners. He's an old man now, has a lot of help, but he still delivers it himself. Says he gets the feel of the town that way. Carries all the accounts in his head; never has to write down a word. Mr. Morgan's drug store ain't the same,-it's all citified. Mr. Morgan retired and went out to live in San Diego, California, where his daughter married a real estate man, name of Kerby. Mr. Morgan died there in 1935 and was buried in a lot of palm trees. Kinda lost his religion at the end and took up New Thought or something. They read some new-fangled poetry over him and cre-mated him. The New Hampshire in him sort of broke down in him in that climate, seems like. The Cartwrights got richer and richer. The house is closed most of the year. They're off eating big dinners in hotels now,—in Virginia Hot Springs and Miami Beach. They say the winters are cold here. I see where they've become 'Piscopalians. The Cartwright interests have just begun building a new bank in Grover's Corners -had to go to Vermont for the marble, sorry to say. And they've asked a friend of mine what they should put in the cornerstone for people to dig up a thousand years from now. Of course, they've put in a copy of the New York Times and a copy of Mr. Webb's Sentinel. We're kind of interested in this because some scientific fellas have found a way of painting all that reading matter with a kind of glue-silicate glue-that'll make it keep a thousand —two thousand years. We're putting in a Bible . . . and the Constitution of the United States and a copy of William Shakespeare's plays. What do you say, folks? What do you think? Y'know-Babylon once had two million people in it, and all we know about 'em is the names of the kings and some copies of wheat contracts and . . . the sales of slaves. Yes, every night all those families sat down to supper, and the father came home from his work, and the smoke went up the chimney,—same as here. And even in Greece and Rome, all we know about the real life of the people is what we can piece together out of the joking poems and the comedies they wrote for the theater back then. So I'm going to have a copy of this play put in the cornerstone and the people a thousand years from now'll know a few simple facts about us-more than the Treaty of Versailles and the Lindbergh flight. See what I mean? Well,—you people a thousand years from now, in the provinces north of New York at the beginning of the Twentieth Century, people et three times a day: soon after sunrise; at noon; and at sunset. Every seventh day, by law and by religion, was a day of rest and all work come to a stop. The religion at that time was Christianity. I guess you have some other records about Christianity. The domestic set-up was marriage: a binding relation between a male and one female that lasted for life. Christianity strictly forbade killing, but you were allowed to kill animals, and you were allowed to kill human beings in war and government punishings. I guess we don't have to tell you about the government and business forms, because that's the kind of thing people seem to hand down first of all. Let me see now if there's anything else. Oh, yes,—at death people were buried in the ground just as they are. So, friends, this is the way we were in our growing up and in our marrying and in our doctoring and in our living and in our dying. Now we'll return to our day in Grover's Corners. A lot of time has gone by. It's evening. You can hear choir practice going on in the Congregational Church. All the children are at home doing their school work. The day is running down like a tired clock.

[A choir partially concealed in the orchestra pit has begun singing "Blessed be the tie that binds." Simon Stimson stands directing them. Two ladders have been pushed on to the stage; they serve as indication of the second story in the Gibbs and Webb houses. George and Emily mount them, and apply themselves to their school work. Dr. Gibbs has entered and is seated in his kitchen reading]

SIMON STIMSON: Now look here, everybody. Music come into the world to give pleasure.—Softer! Softer! Get it out of your heads that music's only good when it's loud. You leave loudness to the Methodists. You couldn't beat 'em, even if you wanted to. Now again. Tenors!

GEORGE: Hssst! Emily!

EMILY: Hello.

GEORGE: Hello!

EMILY: I can't work at all. The moonlight's so terrible.

GEORGE: Emily, did you get the third problem?

EMILY: Which?

GEORGE: The third?

EMILY: Why, yes, George—that's the easiest of them all.

GEORGE: I don't see it. Emily, can you give me a hint?

EMILY: I'll tell you one thing: the answer's in yards.

GEORGE: !!! In yards? How do you mean?

EMILY: In square yards.

GEORGE: Oh . . . in square yards. EMILY: Yes, George, don't you see?

GEORGE: Yeah.

EMILY: In square yards of wallpaper.

george: Wallpaper,—oh, I see. Thanks a lot,

EMILY: You're welcome. My, isn't the moonlight terrible? And choir practice going on.—I think if you hold your breath you can hear the train all the way to Contookuck. Hear it?

GEORGE: M-m-m-What do you know!

EMILY: Well, I guess I better go back and try to work.

GEORGE: Good night, Emily. And thanks.

EMILY: Good night, George.

SIMON STIMSON: Before I forget it: how many of you will be able to come in Tuesday afternoon and sing at Fred Hersey's wedding,—show your hands.

That'll be fine; that'll be right nice. We'll do the same music we did for Jane Trowbridge's last month.

—Now we'll do: "Art thou weary; art thou languid?" It's a question, ladies and gentlemen, make it talk. Ready.

DR. GIBBS: Oh, George, can you come down a minute?

GEORGE: Yes, Pa. [He descends the ladder]

DR. GIBBS: Make yourself comfortable, George; I'll only keep you a minute. George, how old are you?

GEORGE: I? I'm sixteen almost seventeen.

DR. GIBBS: What do you want to do after school's over?

GEORGE: Why, you know, Pa, I want to be a farmer on Uncle Luke's farm.

DR. GIBBS: You'll be willing, will you, to get up early and milk and feed the stock . . . and you'll be able to hoe and hay all day?

GEORGE: Sure, I will. What are you ... what do you mean, Pa?

DR. GIBBS: Well, George, while I was in my office today I heard a funny sound . . . and what do you think it was? It was your mother chopping wood. There you see your mother-getting up early; cooking meals all day long; washing and ironing;-and still she has to go out in the back yard and chop wood. I suppose she just got tired of asking you. She just gave up and decided it was easier to do it herself. And you eat her meals, and put on the clothes she keeps nice for you, and you run off and play baseball,—like she's some hired girl we keep around the house but that we don't like very much. Well, I knew all I had to do was call your attention to it. Here's a handkerchief, son. George, I've decided to raise your spending money twenty-five cents a week. Not, of course, for chopping wood for your mother, because that's a present you give her, but because you're getting older-and I imagine there are lots of things you must find to do with it.

GEORGE: Thanks, Pa.

DR. GIBBS: Let's see—tomorrow's pay day. You can count on it—Hmm. Probably Rebecca'll feel she ought to have some more too. Wonder what could have happened to your mother. Choir practice never was as late as this before.

GEORGE: It's only half-past eight, Pa.

DR. GIBBS: I don't know why she's in that old choir. She hasn't any more voice than an old crow. . . . Traipsin' around the streets at this hour of the night. . . . Just about time you retired, don't you think?

GEORGE: Yes, Pa. [George mounts to his place on the ladder. Laughter and good nights can be heard on stage left and presently Mrs. Gibbs, Mrs. Soames and Mrs. Webb come down Main Street. When they arrive at the center of the stage they stop]

MRS. SOAMES: Good night, Martha. Good night, Mr. Foster.

MRS. WEBB: I'll tell Mr. Webb; I know he'll want to put it in the paper.

MRS. GIBBS: My, it's late!

MRS. SOAMES: Good night, Irma.

MRS. GIBBS: Real nice choir practice, wa'n't it? Myrtle Webb! Look at that moon, will you! Tsk-tsk-tsk. Potato weather, for sure.

MRS. SOAMES: Naturally I didn't want to say a word about it in front of those others, but now we're alone—really, it's the worst scandal that ever was in this town!

MRS. GIBBS: What?

MRS. SOAMES: Simon Stimson!

MRS. GIBBS: Now. Louella!

MRS. SOAMES: But, Julia! To have the organist of a church drink and drunk year after year. You know he was drunk tonight.

MRS. GIBBS: Now, Louella! We all know about Mr. Stimson, and we all know about the troubles he's been through, and Dr. Ferguson knows too, and if Dr. Ferguson keeps him on there in his job the only thing the rest of us can do is just not to notice it.

MRS. SOAMES: Not to notice it! But it's getting worse.

MRS. WEBB: No, it isn't, Louella. It's getting better. I've been in that choir twice as long as you have. It doesn't happen anywhere near so often. . . . My, I hate to go to bed on a night like this.—I better hurry. Those children'll be sitting up till all hours. Good night, Louella. [She hurries down stage, enters her house and disappears]

MRS. GIBBS: Can you get home safe, Louella?

MRS. SOAMES: It's as bright as day. I can see Mr.

Soames scowling at the window now. You'd think we'd been to a dance the way the menfolk carry [Repeated good nights. Mrs. Gibbs arrives at her home]

MRS. CIBBS: Well, we had a real good time.

DR. GIBBS: You're late enough.

MRS. GIBBS: Why, Frank, it ain't any later 'n usual.

DR. GIBBS: And you stopping at the corner to gossip with a lot of hens.

MRS. GIBBS: Now, Frank, don't be grouchy. Come out and smell my heliotrope in the moonlight. [They stroll out arm in arm along the footlights] Isn't that wonderful? What did you do all the time I was away?

DR. GIBBS: Oh, I read—as usual. What were the girls gossiping about tonight?

MRS. GIBBS: Well, believe me, Frank—there is something to gossip about.

DR. GIBBS: Hmm! Simon Stimson far gone, was he?

MRS. GIBBS: Worst I've ever seen him. How'll that end, Frank? Dr. Ferguson can't forgive him forever.

DR. GIBBS: I guess I know more about Simon Stimson's affairs than anybody in this town. Some people ain't made for small town life. I don't know how that'll end; but there's nothing we can do but just leave it alone. Come, get in.

MRS. GIBBS: No, not yet. . . . Oh, Frank, I'm worried about you.

DR. GIBBS: What are you worried about?

MRS. GIBBS: I think it's my duty to make plans for you to get a real rest and change. And if I get that legacy, well, I'm going to insist on it.

DR. GIBBS: Now, Julia, there's no sense in going over that again.

MRS. GIBBS: Frank, you're just unreasonable!

DR. GIBBS: Come on, Julia, it's getting late. First thing you know you'll catch cold. I gave George a piece of my mind tonight. I reckon you'll have your wood chopped for a while anyway. No, no, start getting upstairs.

MRS. GIBBS: Oh, dear. There's always so many things to pick up, seems like. You know, Frank, Mrs. Fairchild always locks her front door every night. All those people up that part of town do.

DR. GIBBS: They're all getting citified, that's the trouble with them. They haven't got nothing fit to burgle and everybody knows it. [They disappear. Rebecca climbs up the ladder beside George]

GEORGE: Get out, Rebecca. There's only room for one at this window. You're always spoiling everything.

REBECCA: Well, let me look just a minute.

GEORGE: Use your own window.

REBECCA: I did; but there's no moon there. . . . George, do you know what I think, do you? I think maybe the moon's getting nearer and nearer and there'll be a big 'splosion.

GEORGE: Rebecca, you don't know anything. If the moon were getting nearer, the guys that sit up all night with telescopes would see it first and they'd tell about it, and it'd be in all the newspapers.

REBECCA: George, is the moon shining on South America, Canada and half the whole world?

GEORGE: Well-prob'ly is.

[The Stage Manager strolls on]

STAGE MANAGER: Nine-thirty. Most of the lights are out. No, there's Constable Warren trying a few doors on Main Street. And here comes Editor Webb, after putting his newspaper to bed.

MR. WEBB: Good evening, Bill.

CONSTABLE WARREN: Evenin', Mr. Webb.

MR. WEBB: Quite a moon! CONSTABLE WARREN: Yepp. MR. WEBB: All quiet tonight?

CONSTABLE WARREN: Simon Stimson is rollin' around a little. Just saw his wife movin' out to hunt for him so I looked the other way—there he is now.

[Simon Stimson comes down Main Street from the left, only a trace of unsteadiness in his walk] MR. WEBB: Good evening, Simon. . . . Town seems to have settled down for the night pretty well. . . . [Simon Stimson comes up to him and pauses a moment] Good evening. . . . Yes, most of the town's settled down for the night, Simon. . . . I guess we better do the same. Can I walk along a ways with you? [Simon Stimson continues on his way without a word and disappears at the right] Good night.

CONSTABLE WARREN: I don't know how that's goin' to end, Mr. Webb.

MR. WEBB: Well, he's seen a peck of trouble, one thing after another. . . . Oh, Bill . . . if you see my boy smoking cigarettes, just give him a word, will you? He thinks a lot of you, Bill.

CONSTABLE WARREN: I don't think he smokes no cigarettes, Mr. Webb. Leastways, not more'n two or three a year. He don't belong to that crowd that hangs out down by the gully.

MR. WEBB: Hm. . . . I hope not.—Well, good night, Bill.

CONSTABLE WARREN: Good night, Mr. Webb. [Exit]

MR. WEBB: Who's that up there? Is that you, Myrtle?

EMILY: No, it's me, Papa.

MR. WEBB: Why aren't you in bed?

EMILY: I don't know. I just can't sleep, Papa. The moonlight's so won-derful. And the smell of Mrs. Gibbs's heliotrope. Can you smell it?

MR. WEBB: Hm. . . Yes. Haven't any troubles on your mind, have you, Emily?

EMILY: Troubles, Papa. No.

MR. WEBB: Well, enjoy yourself, but don't let your mother catch you. Good night, Emily.

EMILY: Good night, Papa.

[Mr. Webb crosses into the house, whistling "Blessed Be the Tie that Binds" and disappears]
REBECCA: I never told you about that letter Jane
Crofut got from her minister when she was sick.
The minister of her church in the town she was in before she came here. He wrote Jane a letter and on the envelope the address was like this: It said:
Jane Crofut; The Crofut Farm; Grover's Corners;
Sutton County; New Hampshire; United States of America.

GEORGE: What's funny about that?

REBECCA: But listen, it's not finished: the United States of America; Continent of North America; Western Hemisphere; the Earth; the Solar System; the Universe; the Mind of God,—that's what it said on the envelope.

george: What do you know!

REBECCA: And the postman brought it just the same.

george: What do you know!

STAGE MANAGER: That's the end of the First Act, friends. You can go and smoke now, those that smoke.

ACT II.

The tables and chairs of the two kitchens are still on the stage. The ladders have been withdrawn. The Stage Manager has been at his accustomed place watching the audience return to its seats.

STAGE MANAGER: Three years have gone by. Yes. the sun's come up over a thousand times. Summers and winters have cracked the mountains a little bit more and the rains have brought down some of the dirt. Some babies that weren't even born before have begun talking regular sentences already; and a number of people who thought they were right young and spry have noticed that they can't bound up a flight of stairs like they used to, without their heart fluttering a little. Some older sons are sitting at the head of the table, and some people I know are having their meat cut up for them.—All that can happen in a thousand days. Nature's been pushing and contriving in other ways, too: a number of young people fell in love and got married. Yes, the mountain got bit away a few fractions of an inch; millions of gallons of water went by the mill; and here and there a new home was set up under a roof. Almost everybody in the world gets married,-you know what I mean? In our town there aren't hardly any exceptions. Most everybody in the world climbs into their graves married. The First Act was called the Daily Life. This Act is called Love and Marriage. There's another Act coming after this: I reckon you can guess what that's about. So: It's three years later. It's 1904. It's July 7th, just after High School Commencement. That's the time most of our young people jump up and get married. Soon as they've passed their last examinations in solid geometry and Cicero's Orations, looks like they suddenly feel themselves fit to be married. It's early morning. Only this time it's been raining. It's been pouring and thundering. Mrs. Gibbs's garden, and Mrs. Webb's here: drenched. All those bean poles and pea vines: drenched. All yesterday over there on Main Street, the rain looked like curtains being blown along. Hm . . . it may begin again any minute. There! You can hear the 5:45 for Boston. And here comes Howie Newsome delivering the milk. And there's Si Crowell delivering the papers like his brother before him.—You remember about his brother?-all that education he's going to get and that'll be wasted. And there's Mrs. Gibbs and Mrs. Webb come down to make breakfast, just as though it were an ordinary day. I don't have to point out to the women in my audience that those ladies they see before them, both those ladies cooked three meals a day,—one of 'em for twenty years, the other for forty,-and no summer vacation. They brought up two children apiece; washed; cleaned the house, -and never a nervous breakdown. Never thought themselves hard-used, either. It's like what one of those Middle West poets said: You've got to love life to have life, and you've got to have life to love life. . . . It's what they call a vicious circle.

[Si Crowell has entered hurling imaginary newspapers into doorways; Howie Newsome has come along Main Street with Bessie]

HOWIE NEWSOME: Git-ap, Bessie.

SI CROWELL: Morning, Howie.

HOWIE NEWSOME: Morning, Si.—Anything in the papers I ought to know?

SI CROWELL: Nothing much, except we're losing the best baseball pitcher Grover's Corners ever had. HOWIE NEWSOME: Reckon he was. He's been standing off the whole of South New Hampshire single-handed, looks like.

ar spourry . Us sould

SI CROWELL: He could hit and run bases, too. HOWIE NEWSOME: Yep. Mighty fine ball player.

Bessie. I guess I can stop and talk if I've a mind to!

SI CROWELL: I don't see how he could give up a thing like that just to get married. Would you, Howie?

HOWIE NEWSOME: Can't tell, Si. Never had no talent that way. [Constable Warren enters. They exchange mornings] You're up early, Bill.

CONSTABLE WARREN: Seein' if there's anything I can do to prevent a flood. River's been risin' all night.

HOWIE NEWSOME: Si Crowell's all worked up here about George Gibbs' retiring from baseball.

CONSTABLE WARREN: Yes, sir; that's the way it goes. Back in '84 we had a player, Si,—even George Gibbs couldn't touch him. Name of Hank Todd. Went down to Maine and become a parson. Wonderful ball player.—Howie, how did the weather look to you?

HOWIE NEWSOME: No, 'tain't bad. Think maybe it'll clear up for good.

[Constable Warren and Si Crowell continue on their way. Howie Newsome brings the milk first to Mrs. Gibbs's house. She meets him by the trellis]

MRS. GIBBS: Good morning, Howie. Do you think it's going to rain again?

HOWIE NEWSOME: Morning, Mrs. Gibbs. It rained so heavy, I think maybe it'll clear up.

MRS. GIBBS: Certainly hope it will.

HOWIE NEWSOME: How much did you want today?

MRS. GIBBS: I guess I'll need three-a-milk and two-a-cream, Howie. I'm going to have a house full of relations.

HOWIE NEWSOME: My wife says to tell you we both hope they'll be very happy, Mrs. Gibbs. Know they will.

MRS. GIBBS: Thanks a lot, Howie. Tell your wife I hope she gits there to the wedding.

HOWIE NEWSOME: Yes, she'll be there; she'll be there if she kin. [Howie Newsome crosses to Mrs. Webb's house] Morning, Mrs. Webb.

MRS. WEBB: Oh, good morning, Mr. Newsome. I told you four quarts of milk, but I hope you can spare me another.

HOWIE NEWSOME: Yes'm . . . and the two cream. MRS. WEBB: Will it rain all day, Mr. Newsome? HOWIE NEWSOME: No'm. Just sayin' to Mrs. Gibbs as how it may lighten up. Mrs. Newsome told me to tell you as how we hope they'll both be very happy, Mrs. Webb. Know they will.

MRS. WEBB: Thank you, and thank Mrs. Newsome and we hope to see you all at the wedding.

HOWIE NEWSOME: Yes, Mrs. Webb. We hope to git there. Couldn't miss that. Chck! Bessie! [Exit Howie Newsome. Dr. Gibbs descends in shirt sleeves, and sits down at his breakfast table]

DR. GIBBS: Well, Ma, the day has come. You're losin' one of your chicks.

MRS. GIBBS: Frank Gibbs, don't you say another word. I feel like crying every minute, Sit down and drink your coffee.

DR. GIBBS: The groom's up shaving himself. Whistling and singing, like he's glad to leave us.—Every now and then he says "I do" to the mirror, but it don't sound convincing to me.

MRS. GIBBS: I declare 1 don't know how he'll get along. I've arranged his clothes and seen to it he's put warm things on,— Frank! they're too young. Emily won't think of such things. He'll catch his death of cold within a week.—Here's something I made for you.

DR. GIBBS: Why, Julia Hersey! French toast!
MRS. GIBBS: 'Tain't hard to make, and I had to do something.

DR. GIBBS: I remember my wedding morning, Julia.

MRS. GIBBS: Now don't start that, Frank Gibbs. I tell you I can't stand it.

DR. GIBBS: I was the scardest young fella in the State of New Hampshire. I thought I'd made a mistake for sure. And when I saw you comin' down that aisle I thought you were the prettiest girl I'd ever seen, but the only trouble was that I'd never seen you before. There I was in the Congregational Church marryin' a total stranger.

MRS. GIBBS: And how do you think I felt!—Did you hear Rebecca stirring about upstairs?

DR. GIBBS: Only morning in the year she hasn't been managing everybody's business. She's shut up in her room. I got the impression that maybe she's crying.

MRS. GIBBS: Good Lord! This has got to stop.—Rebecca! Rebecca! Everything's getting cold down here. [George comes rattling down the stairs, very brisk]

GEORGE: Good morning, everybody. Only five more hours to live. [Makes the gesture of cutting his throat]

MRS. GIBBS: Where are you going?

GEORGE: Just stepping across the grass to see my girl.

MRS. GIBBS: Now, George! You take an umbrella or I won't let you out of this house.

GEORGE: Aw, Ma. It's just a step!

MRS. GIBBS: From tomorrow on you can kill yourself in all weathers, but while you're in my house you live wisely, thank you. There are your overshoes right there in the hall. And here's an umbrella.

GEORGE: Aw, Ma!

DR. GIBBS: George, do as your mother tells you.
MRS. GIBBS: Maybe Mrs. Webb isn't used to callers at seven in the morning. Take a cup-a coffee first.

GEORGE: Be back in a minute. [He crosses the stage, leaping over the puddles] Good morning, Mother Webb.

MRS. WEBB: Goodness! You frightened me!—Now, George, you can come in a minute out of the wet, but you know I can't ask you in.

GEORGE: Why not-?

MRS. WEBB: George, you know's well as I do: the groom can't see his bride on his wedding day, not until he sees her in church.

GEORGE: Aw!—that's just a superstition. [Enter Mr. Webb]

MR. WEBB: Good morning, George.

GEORGE: Mr. Webb, you don't believe in that superstition, do you?

MR. WEBB: There's a lot of common sense in some superstitions, George.

MRS. WEBB: Millions have folla'd it, George, and you don't want to be the first to fly in the face of custom.

GEORGE: How is Emily?

MRS. WEBB: She hasn't waked up yet. I haven't heard a sound out of her.

GEORGE: Emily's asleep!!!

MRS. WEBB: No wonder! We were up 'til all hours,—sewing and packing. I'll tell you what I'll do; you set down here a minute with Mr. Webb and drink this cup of coffee; and I'll go upstairs and see she doesn't come down and surprise you. There's some bacon, too; but don't be long about it. [Exit Mrs. Webb. Embarrassed silence]

MR. WEBB: Well, George, how are you?

GEORGE: Oh, fine. I'm fine. [Pause] Mr. Webb, what sense could there be in a superstition like that?

MR. WEBB: Well, you see,—on her wedding morning a girl's head's apt to be full of . . . clothes and things like that. Don't you think that's probably it?

GEORGE: Ye-e-s. I never thought of that.

MR. WEBB: A girl's apt to be a mite nervous on her wedding day. [Pause]

GEORGE: I wish a fellow could get married without all that marching up and down.

MR. WEBB: Well, every man that's ever lived has felt that way about it, George; but it hasn't done much good. It's the women that have built up weddings, my boy. From now on they have it pretty much as they like.... All those good women standing shoulder to shoulder making sure that the knot's tied in a mighty public way.

Π

GEORGE: But . . . you believe in it, don't you, Mr. Webb?

MR. WEBB: Oh, yes; oh, yes. Don't you misunderstand me, my boy. Marriage is a wonderful thing, wonderful thing. And don't you forget that, George.

GEORGE: No, sir.—Mr. Webb, how old were you when you got married?

MR. WEBB: Well, you see: I'd been to college and I'd taken a little time to get settled. But Mrs. Webb,—she wasn't much older than what Emily is. Oh, age hasn't much to do with it, George,—not compared to other things.

GEORGE: What were you going to say, Mr. Webb? MR. WEBB: Oh, I don't know,—was I going to say something? [Pause] George, I was thinking the other night of some advice my father gave me when I got married. Charles, he said, Charles, start out early showing who's boss, he said. Best thing to do is to give an order, even if it don't make sense; just so she'll learn to obey. And he said: if anything about your wife irritates you,—her conversation, or anything,—just get up and leave the house. That'll make it clear to her, he said. And, oh, yes! he said never never let your wife know how much money you have, never.

GEORGE: Well, Mr. Webb . . . I don't think I could . . .

MR. WEBB: So I took the opposite of my father's advice and I've been happy ever since. And let that be a lesson to you, George, never to ask advice on personal matters.—George, are you going to raise chickens on your farm?

GEORGE: What?

MR. WEBB: Are you going to raise chickens on your farm?

GEORGE: Uncle Luke's never been much interested, but I thought—

MR. WEBB: A book came into my office the other day, George, on the Philo System of raising chickens. I want you to read it. I'm thinking of beginning in a small way in the back yard, and I'm going to put an incubator in the cellar—[Enter Mrs. Webb]

MRS. WEBB: Charles, are you talking about that old incubator again? I thought you two'd be talking about things worth while.

MR. WEBB: Well, Myrtle, if you want to give the boy some good advice, I'll go upstairs and leave you alone with him.

MRS. WEBB: Now, George, I'm sorry, but I've got to send you away so that Emily can come down and get some breakfast. She told me to tell you that she sends you her love but that she doesn't want to lay eyes on you. So good-by, George. [George crosses the stage to his own home and disappears]

MR. WEBB: Myrtle, I guess you don't know about that older superstition.

MRS. WEBB: What do you mean, Charles?

MR. WEBB: Since the cave-men: the groom shouldn't be left alone with his father-in-law on the day of the wedding, or near it. Now don't forget that!

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you. Thank you, everybody. Now I have to interrupt again here. You see, we want to know how all this began,-this wedding, this plan to spend a lifetime together. I'm awfully interested in how big things like that begin. You know how it is: you're twenty-one or twenty-two and you make some decisions; then whisssh! you're seventy: you've been a lawyer for fifty years, and that white-haired lady at your side has eaten over fifty thousand meals with you. How do such things begin? George and Emily are going to show you now the conversation they had when they first knew that . . . that . . . as the saying goes . . . they were meant for one another. But before they do it I want you to try and remember what it was like when you were young, when you were fifteen or sixteen. For some reason it is very hard to do: those days when even the little things in life could be almost too exciting to bear. And particularly the days when you were first in love; when you were like a person sleep-walking, and you didn't quite see the street you were in, and didn't quite hear everything that was said to you. You're just a little bit crazy. Will you remember that, please? Now they'll be coming out of High School at three o'clock. George has just been elected President of the Junior Class, and as it's June, that means he'll be President of the Senior Class all next year. And Emily's just been elected Secretary and Treasurer. I don't have to tell you how important that is. [He places a board across the backs of two chairs, parallel to the footlights, and places two high stools behind it. This is the counter of Mr. Morgan's drugstore] All ready! [Emily, carrying an armful of-imaginary-schoolbooks, comes along Main Street from the left]

EMILY: I can't, Louise. I've got to go home. Goodby. Oh, Earnestine! Earnestine! Can you come over tonight and do Algebra? I did the first and third in Study Hall. No, they're not hard. But, Earnestine, that Caesar's awful hard. I don't see why we have to do a thing like that. Come over about seven. Tell your mother you have to. G'by. G'by, Helen. G'by, Fred. [George, also carrying books, catches up with her]

GEORGE: Can I carry your books home for you, Emily?

EMILY: [Coldly] Thank you. [She gives them to him]

GEORGE: Excuse me a minute, Emily.—Say, Bob, get everything ready. I'll be there in a quarter of an hour. If I'm a little late start practice anyway. And give Herb some long high ones. His eye needs a lot of practice. Seeya later.

EMILY: Good-by, Lizzy.

GEORGE: Good-by, Lizzy.—I'm awfully glad you were elected, too, Emily.

EMILY: Thank you.

[They have been standing on Main Street, almost against the back wall. George is about to take the first steps towards the audience when he stops again and says:]

GEORGE: Emily, why are you mad at me?

EMILY: I'm not mad at you.

GEORGE: You . . . you treat me so funny.

EMILY: Well, I might as well say it right out, George. I don't like the whole change that's come over you in the last year. I'm sorry if that hurts your feelings, but I've just got to tell the truth and shame the devil.

GEORGE: I'm awfully sorry, Emily. Wha-a-what do you mean?

EMILY: Well, up to a year ago I used to like you a lot. And I used to watch you as you did everything . . . because we'd been friends so long . . . and then you began spending all your time at baseball . . . and you never even spoke to anybody any more; not even to your own family you didn't . . . and, George, it's a fact, you've got awful conceited and stuck-up, and all the girls say so. They may not say so to your face, but that's what they say about you behind your back, and it hurts me to hear them say it, but I've got to agree with them a little. I'm sorry if it hurts your feelings . . . but I can't be sorry I said it.

GEORGE: I... I'm glad you said it, Emily. I never thought that such a thing was happening to me. I guess it's hard for a fella not to have faults creep into his character. [They take a step or two in silence, then stand still in misery]

EMILY: I always expect a man to be perfect and I think he should be.

GEORGE: Oh . . . I don't think it's possible to be perfect, Emily.

EMILY: Well, my father is, and as far as I can see your father is. There's no reason on earth why you shouldn't be, too.

GEORGE: Well, Emily . . . I feel it's the other way round. That men aren't naturally good; but girls are. Like you and your mother and my mother.

EMILY: Well, you might as well know right now that I'm not perfect. It's not as easy for a girl to be perfect as a man, because we girls are more nervous.

Now I'm sorry I said all that about you. I don't know what made me say it.

GEORGE: No, no,—I guess if it's the truth you ought to say it. You stick to it, Emily.

EMILY: I don't know if it's the truth or not. And I suddenly feel that it isn't important at all.

GEORGE: Emily, would you like an ice-cream soda, or something, before you go home?

EMILY: Well, thank you . . . I would. [They come into the drugstore and seat themselves on the stools]

STAGE MANAGER: [As Mr. Morgan:] Hello, George. Hello, Emily. What'll you have? Why, Emily Webb, what've you been crying about?

GEORGE: [He gropes for an explanation] She . . . she just got an awful scare, Mr. Morgan. She almost got run over by that hardware store wagon. Everybody always says that Tom Huckins drives like a crazy man.

STAGE MANAGER: Here, take a drink of water, Emily. You look all shook up. There!—Now, what'll you have?

EMILY: I'll have a strawberry phosphate, thank you, Mr. Morgan.

GEORGE: No, no. You go and have an ice-cream soda with me, Emily.—Two strawberry ice-cream sodas, Mr. Morgan.

STAGE MANAGER: [Working the faucets] Yes, sir. I tell you, you've got to look both ways before you cross Main Street these days. Gets worse every year. There are a hundred and twenty-five horses in Grover's Corners this minute I'm talking to you. State Inspector was in here yesterday. And now they're bringing in these auto-mo-biles, the best thing to do is to just stay home. Why, I can remember the time when a dog could lie down all day in the middle of Main Street and nothing would come to disturb him.

—Yes, Miss Ellis; be with you in a minute. Here are your sodas. Enjoy 'em. [He goes off]

EMILY: They're so expensive

GEORGE: No, no—don't you think of that. We're celebrating. First, we're celebrating our election. And then do you know what else I'm celebrating?

EMILY: No.

GEORGE: I'm celebrating because I've got a friend who tells me all the things that ought to be told me. EMILY: George, please don't think of that. I don't know why I said it, It's not true. You're—

GEORGE: No, you stick to it, Emily. I'm glad you spoke to me like you did. But you'll see: I'm going to change so quick—you bet I'm going to change. And, Emily, I want to ask you a favor.

EMILY: What?

GEORGE: Emily, if I go away to State Agriculture College next year, will you write me a letter once in a while?

EMILY: I certainly will. I certainly will, George. . . . [Pause] It certainly seems like being away three years you'd get out of touch with things.

GEORGE: No, no. I mustn't do that. You see I'm not only going to be just a farmer. After a while maybe I'll run for something to get elected. So your letters'll be very important to me; you know, telling me what's going on here and everything. . . .

EMILY: Just the same, three years is a long time. Maybe letters from Grover's Corners wouldn't be so interesting after a while. Grover's Corners isn't a very important place when you think of all New Hampshire; but I think it's a very nice town.

GEORGE: The day wouldn't come when I wouldn't want to know everything that's happening here. I know that's true, Emily.

EMILY: Well, I'll try to make my letters interesting. [Pause]

GEORGE: Y'know, Emily, whenever I meet a farmer I ask him if he thinks it's important to go to Agriculture School to be a good farmer.

EMILY: Why, George-

GEORGE: Yeah, and some of them say that it's even a waste of time. You can get all those things, anyway, out of the pamphlets the government sends out. And Uncle Luke's getting old,—he's about ready for me to start in taking over his farm tomorrow, if I could.

EMILY: My!

GEORGE: And, like you say, being gone all that time . . . in other places and meeting other people . . . If anything like that can happen I don't want to go away. I guess new people aren't any better than old ones. I'll bet they almost never are. Emily, . . . I feel that you're as good a friend as I've got. I don't need to go and meet the people in other towns.

EMILY: But, George, maybe it's very important for you to go and learn all that about cattle-judging and soils and those things. And if you're going into politics, maybe you ought to meet people from other parts of the State . . . of course, I don't know.

GEORGE: [After a pause] Emily, I'm going to make up my mind right now. I won't go. I'll tell Pa about it tonight.

EMILY: Why, George, I don't see why you have to decide right now. It's a whole year away.

GEORGE: Emily, I'm glad you spoke to me about that . . . that fault in my character. And what you said was right; but there was one thing wrong in it, and that was when you said that for a year I wasn't noticing people, and . . . you, for instance. Listen, Emily . . . you say you were watching me when I did everything. . . . Why, I was doing the same about you all the time. Why, sure,-I always thought about you as one of the chief people I thought about. I always made sure where you were sitting on the bleachers, and who you were with. And we've always had lots of talks . . . and joking, in the halls; and they always meant a lot to me. Of course, they weren't as good as the talk we're having now. Lately I'd been noticing that you'd been acting kind of funny to me, and for three days I've been trying to walk home with you, but something's always got in the way. Yesterday I was standing over against the wall waiting for you, and you walked home with Miss Corcoran.

EMILY: George! . . . Life's awful funny! How could I have known that? Why, I thought—

GEORGE: Listen, Emily, I'm going to tell you why I'm not going to Agriculture School. I think that once you've found a person that you're very fond of . . . I mean a person who's fond of you, too,—at least enough to be interested in your character . . . Well, I think that's just as important as college is, and even more so. That's what I think.

EMILY: I think it's awfully important, too. GEORGE: Emily.

EMILY: Yes, George.

GEORGE: Emily, if I improve and make a big change . . . would you be . . . I mean: could you be . . .

EMILY: I . . . I am now; I always have been.

GEORGE: [Pause] So I guess this is an important talk we've been having.

EMILY: Yes.

GEORGE: [Takes a deep breath and straightens his back] Wait just a minute and I'll take you home. [He rises and goes to the Stage Manager who appears and comes toward him] Mr. Morgan, I'll have to go home and get the money to pay you for this. It'll only take me a minute.

STAGE MANAGER: What's that? George Gibbs, do you mean to tell me—!

GEORGE: Yes, but I had reasons, Mr. Morgan.—Look, here's my gold watch to keep until I come back with the money.

STAGE MANAGER: That's all right. Keep your watch. I'll trust you.

GEORGE: I'll be back in five minutes.

STAGE MANAGER: I'll trust you ten years, George, —not a day more.—Got all over your shock, Emily? EMILY: Yes, thank you, Mr. Morgan. It was nothing.

GEORGE: [Taking up the books from the counter] I'm ready.

[They walk in grave silence down the stage, turn, and pass through the trellis at the Webbs' back door and disappear]

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you, Emily. Thank you, George. Now before we go on to the wedding, there are still some more things we ought to know about this—about this marriage. I want to know some more about how the parents took it; but what I want to know most of all is: oh, you know what I mean,—what Grover's Corners thought about marriage anyway. You know's well as I do: people are never able to say right out what they think of money, or death, or fame, or marriage. You've got to catch it between the lines; you got to over-hear it. Oh, Doctor! Mrs. Gibbs!

[They appear at their side of the stage and exchange a glance of understanding with him. The Stage Manager lays the same plank across two chairs that served as a drugstore counter and it has now become Mrs. Gibbs's ironing board. Dr. Gibbs sits down in a rocker and smokes. Mrs. Gibbs irons a moment in silence; then goes to the foot of the stairs and calls:

MRS. GIBBS: Rebecca! It's time you turned out your light and went to sleep. George, you'd better get some sleep, too.

REBECCA'S VOICE: Ma, I haven't finished my English.

MRS. GIBBS: What? Well, I bet you haven't been working, Rebecca. You've been reading that Sears, Roebuck catalogue, that's what you've been doing.

—All right, I'll give you ten more minutes. If you haven't finished by then you'll just have to fail the course and be a disgrace to your father and me.—George, what are you doing?

GEORGE'S VOICE: [Hurt] I'm doing history.

MRS. GIBBS: Well, you'd better go to bed. You're probably sleeping at the desk as it is. [She casts an amused eye at her husband and returns to her ironing]

DR. GIBBS: I had a long talk with the boy today.

MRS. GIBBS: Did you?

DR. GIBBS: I tell you, Mrs. G., there's nothing so terrifying in the world as a son. The relation of a father to a son is the damnedest, awkwardest—. I always come away feeling like a soggy sponge of hypocrisy.

MRS. GIBBS: Well, a mother and a daughter's no picnic, let me tell you.

DR. GIBBS: George is set on it: he wants to marry Emily 'soon as school's out and take her right on to the farm. [Pause] He says he can sit up nights and learn agriculture from government pamphlets, without going to college for it.

MRS. GIBBS: He always was crazy about farming. Gets that from my people.

DR. GIBBS: At a pinch, I guess he could start in farming;—but I swear I think he's too young to get married. Julia, he's just a green half-grown kid. He isn't ready to be a family man.

MRS. GIBBS: No, he ain't. You're right.—But he's a good boy and I wouldn't like to think of him being alone out there... coming into town Satiddy nights, like any old farm hand, tuckered out from work and looking for excitement. He might get into bad ways. It wouldn't be enough fun for him to come and sit by our stove,—and holding hands with Emily, for a year mightn't be enough either. He might lose interest in her.

DR. GIBBS: Hm.

MRS. GIBBS: Frank, I' been watching her. George is a lucky boy when you think of all the silly girls in the world.

DR. GIBBS: But, Julia,—George married. That great gangling selfish nincumpoop.

MRS. GIBBS: Yes, I know. [She takes up a collar and examines it] Frank, what do you do to your collars? Do you gnaw 'em? I never saw such a man for collars.

DR. GIBBS: Julia, when I married you, do you know what one of my terrors was in getting married?

MRS. GIBBS: Pshaw! Go on with you!

DR. GIBBS: I was afraid we weren't going to have material for conversation more'n 'ld last us a few weeks. I was afraid we'd run out and eat our meals in silence, that's a fact. You and I've been conversing for twenty years now without any noticeable barren spells.

MRS. GIBBS: Well, good weather, bad weather, 'tain't very choice, but I always manage to find something to say. [Pause]

DR. GIBBS: What do you think? What do you think,

Julia? Shall we tell the boy he can go ahead and get married?

MRS. GIBBS: Seems like it's up to us to decide. Myrtle and Charles Webb are willing. They think it's a good idea to throw the young people into the sea and let'm sink or swim, as soon as they're ready.

DR. GIBBS: What does that mean? Must we decide right now? This minute?

MRS. GIBBS: There you go putting the responsibility on me!

DR. GIBBS: Here it is, almost April.—I'll go up and say a word to him right now before he goes to bed. [He rises] You're sure, Julia? You've nothing more to add?

MRS. GIBBS: [Stops ironing a moment] I don't know what to say. Seems like it's too much to ask, for a big outdoor boy like that to go and get shut up in classrooms for three years. And once he's on the farm, he might just as well have a companion, seeing he's found a fine girl like Emily. . . . People are meant to live two by two in this world. . . . Yes, Frank, go up and tell him it's all right.

DR. GIBBS: [Crosses and is about to call when]

MRS. GIBBS: [Her hands on her cheeks, staring into the audience, in sharp alarm] Wait a minute! Wait a minute!—[Then resuming her ironing] No,—go and tell him.

DR. GIBBS: Why did you stop then, Julia?

MRS. GIBBS: Oh, you know: I thought of all those times we went through in the first years when George and Rebecca were babies,—you walking up and down with them at three in the morning; the whooping-cough; the time George fell off the porch. You and I were twenty-five years old, and more. It's wonderful how one forgets one's troubles, like that.

—Yes, Frank, go upstairs and tell him. . . . It's worth it.

DR. GIBBS: Yes, they'll have a lot of troubles, but that's none of our business. Let'm. Everybody has a right to his own troubles.—You ought to be present, Julia,—important occasion like that. I'll call him.—George! Oh, George!

"GEORGE'S VOICE: Yes, Pa.

DR. GIBBS: Can you come down a minute? Your mother and I want to speak to you.

GEORGE: Yeah, sure.

MRS. GIBBS: [Putting her arm through her husband's] Lord, what a fool I am: I'm trembling all over. There's nothing to tremble about.

STAGE MANAGER: Thank you! Thank you! Now we're ready to go on with the wedding. [While he talks, the actors remove the chair and tables and trellises from the Gibbs and Webb homes. They arrange the pews for the church in the back of the stage. The congregation will sit facing the back wall. The aisle of the church is in the middle of the scene. A small platform is placed against the back wall on which the Stage Manager as Minister can stand. There are a lot of thoughts that go on during a wedding. We can't get them all into one wedding, naturally, and especially not into a wedding at Grover's Corners where they're awfully plain and short. In this wedding I play the minister. That gives me the right to say a few more things about it. For a while now, the play gets pretty serious. Y'see, some churches say that marriage is a sacrament. I don't quite know what that means, but I can guess. Like Mrs. Gibbs said a few minutes ago: People were made to live two-by-two. This is a good wedding, but people are so put together that even at a good wedding there's a lot of confusion way down deep in people's minds and we thought that that ought to be in our play, too. The real hero of this scene isn't on the stage at all, and you know who that is. It's like what one of those European fellas said: every child born into the world is Nature's attempt to make a perfect human being. Well. we've seen nature pushing and contriving for some time now. We all know that nature's interested in quantity; but I think she's interested in quality, too, -that's why I'm in the ministry.-Maybe she's trying to make another good governor for New Hampshire. And don't forget the other witnesses at this wedding,-the ancestors. Millions of them. Most of them set out to live two-by-two, also. Millions of them. Well, that's all my sermon. 'Twan't very long. anyway.

[The organ starts playing Handel's "Largo." The congregation streams into the church and sits in silence. Mrs. Webb, on the way to her place, turns back and speaks to the audience]

MRS. WEBB: I don't know why on earth I should be crying. I suppose there's nothing to cry about. It came over me at breakfast this morning; there was Emily eating her breakfast as she's done for seventeen years and now she's going off to eat it in someone else's house. I suppose that's it. And Emily! She suddenly said: I can't eat another mouthful, and she put her head down on the table and she cried. [She starts toward her seat in the church, but turns back and adds] Oh, I've got to say it: you know, there's something downright cruel about sending our girls out into marriage this way. I hope some of her girl friends have told her a thing or two. It's cruel, I know, but I couldn't bring myself to say anything. I went into it blind as a bat myself. The whole world's wrong, that's what's the matter. There they come. [She hurries to her place in the pew. George starts to come down the right aisle of the theater, through the audience. Suddenly three members of his baseball team appear by the right proscenium pillar and start whistling and catcalling to him. They are dressed for the ball field

THE BASEBALL PLAYERS: Eh, George, George! Hsst—yaow! If things don't go right, call us in. We know what to do. Eh, fellas? Yaow! George, don't look so innocent, you old geezer. We know what you're thinking. Don't disgrace the team, big boy. Whooooo-oo.

STAGE MANAGER: All right! All right! That'll do. That's enough of that. [Smiling, he pushes them off the stage. They lean back to shout a few more catcalls] There used to be an awful lot of that kind of thing at weddings in the old days,—Rome, and later. We're more civilized now,—so they say.

[The choir starts singing "Love divine, all love excelling—." George has reached the stage. He stares at the congregation a moment, then takes a few steps of withdrawal, toward the right proscenium pillar]

GEORGE: [Darkly, to himself] I wish I were back at school. . . . I don't want to get married. [His mother has left her seat and come toward him. She stops, looking at him anxiously]

MRS. GIBBS: George, what's the matter?

GEORGE: Ma, I don't want to grow old. Why's everybody pushing me so?

MRS. GIBBS: Why, George . . . you wanted it. GEORGE: Why do I have to get married at all? Listen, Ma, for the last time I ask you—

MRS. GIBBS: No, no, George . . . you're a man now.

GEORGE: Listen, Ma, you never listen to me. All I want to do is to be a fella . . . why do—

MRS. GIBBS: George! If anyone should hear you! Now stop. Why, I'm ashamed of you!

GEORGE: [Passing his hand over his forehead] What's the matter? I've been dreaming. Where's Emily?

MRS. GIBBS: Gracious! You gave me such a turn. GEORGE: Cheer up, Ma. What are you looking so funny for? Cheer up; I'm getting married.

MRS. GIBBS: Let me catch my breath a minute.

GEORGE: Now, Ma, you have Thursday nights. Emily and I are coming over to dinner every Thursday night... you'll see. Ma, what are you crying for? Come on; we've got to get ready for this.

[In the meantime, Emily, in white and wearing her wedding veil, has come through the audience and mounted on to the stage. She too draws back when she sees the congregation in the church. The choir begins: "Blessed be the tie that binds"]

EMILY: I never felt so alone in my whole life. And George over there, looking so . . . ! I hate him. I wish I were dead. Papa! Papa!

MR. WEBB: [Leaves his seat in the pews and comes toward her anxiously] Emily! Emily! Now don't get upset. . . .

EMILY: But, Papa,—I don't want to get married. . . .

MR. WEBB: Sh-sh—Emily. Everything's all right. EMILY: Why can't I stay for a while just as I am? Let's go away.

MR. WEBB: No, no, Emily. Now stop and think. EMILY: Don't you remember that you used to say,—all the time you used to say that I was your girl. There must be lots of places we can go to. Let's go away. I'll work for you. I could keep house.

MR. WEBB: Sh. . . . You mustn't think of such things. You're just nervous, Emily. Now, now,—you're marrying the best young fellow in the world. George is a fine fellow.

EMILY: But, Papa,-

MR. WEBB: George! George! [Mrs. Gibbs returns to her seat. George hears Mr. Webb and looks up. Mr. Webb beckons to him. They move to the center of the stage] I'm giving away my daughter, George. Do you think you can take care of her?

GEORGE: Mr. Webb, I want to . . . I want to try. Emily, I'm going to do my best. I love you, Emily. I need you.

EMILY: Well, if you love me, help me. All I want is someone to love me.

GEORGE: I will, Emily.

EMILY: If ever I'm sick or in trouble, that's what I mean.

GEORGE: Emily, I'll try. I'll try.

EMILY: And I mean for ever. Do you hear? For ever and ever. [They fall into each other's arms. The March from "Lohengrin" is heard]

MR. WEBB: Come, they're waiting for us. Now you know it'll be all right. Come, quick.

[George slips away and takes his place beside the Stage Manager-Clergyman. Emily proceeds up the aisle on her father's arm]

STAGE MANAGER: Do you, George, take this woman, Emily, to be your wedded wife, to have . . .

[Mrs. Soames has been sitting in the last row of the congregation. She now turns to her neighbors and in a shrill voice says]

MRS. SOAMES: Perfectly lovely wedding! Loveliest wedding I ever saw. Oh, I do love a good wedding, don't you? Doesn't she make a lovely bride?

GEORGE: I do.

STAGE MANAGER: Do you, Emily, take this man, George, to be your wedded husband,—

MRS. SOAMES: Don't know when I've seen such a lovely wedding. But I always cry. Don't know why it is, but I always cry. I just like to see young people happy, don't you? Oh, I think it's lovely. [The ring. The kiss. The stage is suddenly arrested into silent, tableau. The Stage Manager, his eyes on the distance, says to the audience:] I've married two hundred couples in my day. Do I believe in it? I don't know. M. . . . marries N. . . . millions of them. The cottage, the gocart, the Sunday afternoon drives in the Ford, the first rheumatism, the grandchildren, the second rheumatism, the deathbed, the reading of the will,—Once in a thousand times it's interesting. Well, let's have Mendelssohn's "Wedding March"!

[The organ picks up the March. The bride and groom come down the aisle, radiant, but trying to be very dignified]

MRS. SOAMES: Aren't they a lovely couple? Oh, I've never been to such a nice wedding. I'm sure they'll be happy. I always say: happiness, that's the great thing! The important thing is to be happy.

[The bride and groom reach the steps leading into the audience. A bright light is thrown upon them. They descend into the auditorium and run up the aisle joyously]

STAGE MANAGER: That's all the Second Act. Ten minutes' intermission, folks.

ACT III.

During the intermission the audience has seen the actors arranging the stage. On the right hand side, a little right of the center, ten or twelve ordinary chairs have been placed in three openly spaced rows facing the audience. These are graves in the cemetery. Towards the end of the intermission the actors enter and take their places. The front row contains: toward the center of the stage, an empty chair; then Mrs. Gibbs, Simon Stimson. The second row contains, among others, Mrs. Soames. The third row has Wally Webb. The dead sit in a quiet without stiffness, and in a patience without listlessness. The Stage Manager takes his accustomed place and waits for the house-lights to go down.

STAGE MANAGER: This time nine years have gone by, friends—summer, 1913. Gradual changes in Grover's Corners. Horses are getting rarer. Farmers coming into town in Fords. Chief difference is in the young people, far as I can see. They want to go to the moving pictures all the time. They want to wear clothes like they see there . . . want to be citified. Everybody locks their house doors now at night. Ain't been any burglars in town yet, but everybody's heard about 'em. But you'd be surprised though—on the whole, things don't change much at Grover's Corners. Guess you want to know what all these chairs are here fur. Smarter ones have guessed it already. I don't know how you feel about such things; but this certainly is a beautiful place. It's on a hilltop—a windy hilltop—lots of sky, lots of clouds, -often lots of sun and moon and stars. You come up here on a fine afternoon and you can see range on range of hills-awful blue they are-up there by Lake Sunapee and Lake Winnapassaukee . . . and way up, if you've got a glass, you can see the White Mountains and Mt. Washington-where North Conway and Conway is. And, of course, our favorite mountain, Mt. Monadnock's, right here-and all around it lie these towns—Jaffrey, 'n East Jaffrey, 'n Peterborough, 'n Dublin and [Then pointing down in the audience] there, quite a ways down is Grover's Corners. Yes, beautiful spot up here. Mountain laurel and li-lacks. I often wonder why people like to be buried in Woodlawn and Brooklyn when they might pass the same time up here in New Hampshire. Over in that corner—[Pointing to stage left] are the old stones,-1670, 1680. Strong-minded people that come a long way to be independent. Summer people walk around there laughing at the funny words on the tombstones . . . it don't do any harm. And genealogists come up from Boston-get paid by city people for looking up their ancestors. They want to make sure they're Daughters of the American Revolution and of the Mayflower. . . . Well, I guess that don't do any harm, either. Wherever you come near the human race, there's layers and layers of nonsense. . . . Over there are some Civil War veterans too. Iron flags on their graves. . . . New Hampshire boys . . . had a notion that the Union ought to be kept together, though they'd never seen more than fifty miles of it themselves. All they knew was the name, friends—the United States of America. The United States of America. And they went and died about it. This here is the new part of the cemetery. Here's your friend, Mrs. Gibbs. 'N let me see— Here's Mr. Stimson, organist at the Congregational Church. And over there's Mrs. Soames who enjoyed the wedding so-vou remember? Oh, and a lot of others. And Editor Webb's boy, Wallace, whose appendix burst while he was on a Boy Scout trip to Crawford Notch. Yes, an awful lot of sorrow has sort of quieted down up here. People just wild with grief have brought their relatives up to this hill. We all know how it is . . . and then time . . . and sunny days . . . and rainy days . . . 'n snow . . . tz-tz-tz. We're all glad they're in a beautiful place and we're coming up here ourselves when our fit's over. This certainly is an important part of Grover's Corners. A lot of thoughts come up here, night and day, but there's no post office. Now I'm going to tell you some things you know already. You know'm as well as I do; but you don't take'm out and look at'm very often. I don't care what they say with their mouths-everybody knows that something is eternal. And it ain't houses and it ain't names, and it ain't earth, and it ain't even the stars . . . everybody knows in their bones that something is eternal, and that something has to do with human beings. All the greatest people ever lived have been telling us that for five thousand years and yet you'd be surprised how people are always losing hold of it. There's something way down deep that's eternal about every human being. [Pause] You know as well as I do that the dead don't stay interested in us living people for very long. Gradually, gradually, they let hold of the earth . . . and the ambitions they had . . . and the pleasures they had . . . and the things they suffered . . . and the people they loved. They get weaned away from earth—that's the way I put it,—weaned away. Yes, they stay here while the earth-part of 'em burns away, burns out, and all that time they slowly get indifferent to what's goin' on in Grover's Corners. They're waitin'. They're waitin' for something that they feel is comin'. Something important and great. Aren't they waitin' for the eternal part in them to come out clear? Some of the things they're going to say maybe'll hurt your feelings—but that's the way it is: mother'n daughter . . . husband 'n wife . . . enemy

'n enemy . . . money 'n miser . . . all those terribly important things kind of grow pale around here. And what's left? What's left when memory's gone, and your identity, Mrs. Smith? [He looks at the audience a minute, then turns to the stage] Well! There are some living people. There's Joe Stoddard, our undertaker, supervising a new-made grave. And here comes a Grover's Corners boy, that left town to go out West.

[Joe Stoddard has hovered about in the background. Sam Craig enters left, wiping his forehead from the exertion. He carries an umbrella and strolls front]

SAM CRAIG: Good afternoon, Joe Stoddard.

JOE STODDARD: Good afternoon, good afternoon. Let me see now: do I know you?

SAM CRAIG: I'm Sam Craig.

JOE STODDARD: Gracious sakes' alive! Of all people! I should'a knowed you'd be back for the funeral. You've been away a long time, Sam.

SAM CRAIG: Yes, I've been away over twelve years. I'm in business out in Buffalo now, Joe. But I was in the East when I got news of my cousin's death, so I thought I'd combine things a little and come and see the old home. You look well.

JOE STODDARD: Yes, yes, can't complain. Very sad, our journey today, Samuel.

SAM CRAIG: Yes.

JOE STODDARD: Yes, yes. I always say, I hate to supervise when a young person is taken. I see you brought your umbrella. It's going to rain and make it sadder still, seems like. They'll be here in a few minutes now. I had to come here early today—my son's supervisin' at the home.

SAM CRAIG: [Reading stones] Old Farmer McCarty, I used to do chores for him—after school. He had the lumbago.

JOE STODDARD: Yes, we brought Farmer McCarty here a number of years ago now.

SAM CRAIG: [Staring at Mrs. Gibbs' knees] Why, this is my Aunt Julia. . . I'd forgotten that she'd . . . of course, of course.

JOE STODDARD: Yes, Doc Gibbs lost his wife twothree years ago . . . about this time. And today's another pretty bad blow for him, too.

MRS. GIBBS: [To Simon Stimson: in an even voice] That's my sister Carey's boy, Sam. . . . Sam Craig. SIMON STIMSON: I'm always uncomfortable when they're around.

MRS. GIBBS: Simon.

SIMON STIMSON: They and their nonsense and their damned glee at being alive. . . .

MRS. GIBBS: Simon, be patient. . . .

SAM CRAIG: Do they choose their own verses much, Joe?

JOE STODDARD: No . . . not usual. Mostly the bereaved pick a verse.

SAM CRAIG: Doesn't sound like Aunt Julia. There aren't many of those Hersey sisters left now. Let me see: where are . . . I wanted to look at my father's and mother's . . .

JOE STODDARD: Over there with the Craigs. . . . Avenue F.

SAM CRAIG: [Reading Simon Stimson's epitaph] He was organist at church, wasn't he?—Hm, drank a lot, we used to say.

JOE STODDARD: Nobody was supposed to know about it. He'd seen a peck of trouble. Those musical fellas ain't like the rest of us, I reckon. [Behind his hand] Took his own life, y' know?

SAM CRAIG: Oh, did he?

JOE STODDARD: Hung himself in the attic. They tried to hush it up, but of course it got around. His wife's just married Senator Barstow. Many a time I've seen her, eleven o'clock at night, goin' around the streets huntin' for her husband. Think c' that! Now she's married to Senator Barstow over at Manchester. He chose his own epy-taph. You can see it there. It ain't a verse exactly.

SAM CRAIG: Why, it's just some notes of music—what is it?

JOE STODDARD: Oh, I wouldn't know. It was wrote up in the Boston papers at the time.

SAM CRAIG: Joe, what did she die of?

JOE STODDARD: Who? SAM CRAIG: My cousin.

JOE STODDARD: Oh, didn't you know? Had some trouble bringing a baby into the world. Let's see, today's Friday—'twas almost a week ago now.

SAM CRAIG: [Putting up his umbrella] Did the baby live?

JOE STODDARD: [Raising his coat collar] No. 'Twas her second, though. There's a little boy 'bout four years old.

SAM CRAIG: The grave's going to be over there?

JOE STODDARD: Yes, there ain't much more room over here among the Gibbses, so they're opening up a whole new Gibbs section over by Avenue B. You'll excuse me now. I see they're comin'.

THE DEAD: [Not lugubrious; and strongly New England in accent] Rain'll do a lot of good.—Yes, reckon things were gettin' downright parched. Don't look like it's goin' to last long, tho'.—Lemuel, you remember the floods of '79? Carried away all the bridges but one.

[From left to right, at the back of the stage, comes a procession. Four men carry a casket, invisible to us. All the rest are under umbrellas. One can vaguely see: Dr. Gibbs, George, the Webbs, etc. They gather about a grave in the back center of the stage, a little to the left of center]

MRS. SOAMES: Who is it, Julia?

MRS. GIBBS: [Without raising her eyes] My daughter-in-law, Emily Webb.

MRS. SOAMES: [A little surprised, but no emotion] Well, I declare! The road up here must have been awful muddy. What did she die of, Julia?

MRS. GIBBS: In childbirth.

MRS. SOAMES: Childbirth. [Almost with a laugh] I'd forgotten all about that! My, wasn't life awful—[With a sigh] and wonderful.

SIMON STIMSON: [With a sideways glance] Wonderful, was it?

MRS. GIBBS: Simon! Now, remember!

MRS. SOAMES: I remember Emily's wedding. Wasn't it a lovely wedding! And I remember her reading the class poem at Graduation Exercises. Emily was one of the brightest girls ever graduated from High School. I've heard Principal Wilkins say so time after time. I called on them at their new farm, just before I died. Perfectly beautiful farm.

A WOMAN FROM AMONG THE DEAD: It's on the same road we lived on.

A MAN AMONG THE DEAD: Yes, just near the Elks' picnic grounds. Remember, Joe? By the lake where we always used to go Fourth of July? Right smart farm.

[They subside. The group by the grave starts singing "Blessed be the tie that binds"]

A WOMAN AMONG THE DEAD: I always liked that hymn. I was hopin' they'd sing a hymn.

A MAN AMONG THE DEAD: My wife—my second wife—knows all the verses of about every hymn there is. It just beats the Dutch . . . she can go through them all by heart.

[Pause. Suddenly Emily appears from among the umbrellas. She is wearing a white dress. Her hair is down her back and tied by a white ribbon like a little girl. She comes slowly, gazing wonderingly at the dead, a little dazed. She stops halfway and smiles faintly]

EMILY: Hello.

VOICES AMONG THE DEAD: Hello, Emily. H'lo, M's. Gibbs.

EMILY: Hello, Mother Gibbs.

MRS. GIBBS: Emily.

EMILY: Hello. [The hymn continues. Emily looks back at the funeral. She says dreamily:] It's raining.

MRS. GIBBS: Yes. . . . They'll be gone soon, dear.

Just rest yourself. [Emily sits down in the empty chair by Mrs. Gibbs]

EMILY: It seems thousands and thousands of years since I. . . . How stupid they all look. They don't have to look like that!

MRS. GIBBS: Don't look at them now, dear. They'll be gone soon.

EMILY: Oh, I wish I'd been here a long time. I don't like being new here.—How do you do, Mr. Stimson?

SIMON STIMSON: How do you do, Emily.

[Emily continues to look about her with a wan and wondering smile; but for a moment her eyes do not return to the funeral group. As though to shut out from her mind the thought of that group she starts speaking to Mrs. Gibbs with a touch of nervousness]

EMILY: Mother Gibbs, George and I have made that farm into just the best place you ever saw. We thought of you all the time. We wanted to show you the new barn and a great long ce-ment drinking fountain for the stock. We bought that out of the money you left us.

MRS. GIBBS: I did?

EMILY: Don't you remember, Mother Gibbs—the legacy you left us? Why, it was over three hundred and fifty dollars.

MRS. GIBBS: Yes, yes, Emily.

EMILY: Well, there's a patent device on this drinking fountain so that it never overflows, Mother Gibbs, and it never sinks below a certain mark they have there. It's fine. [Her voice trails off and her eyes return to the funeral group] It won't be the same to George without me, but it's a lovely farm. [Suddenly she looks directly at Mrs. Gibbs] Live people don't understand, do they?

MRS. GIBBS: No, dear—not very much.

EMILY: They're sort of shut up in little boxes, aren't they? I feel as though I knew them last a thousand years ago. . . . My boy is spending the day at Mrs. Carter's. [She sees Mr. Carter among the dead] Oh, Mr. Carter, my little boy is spending the day at your house.

MR. CARTER: Is he?

EMILY: Yes, he loves it there.—Mother Gibbs, we have a Ford, too. Never gives any trouble. I don't drive, though. Mother Gibbs, when does this feeling go away?—Of being . . . one of them? How long does it . . . ?

MRS. GIBBS: Sh! dear. Just wait and be patient. EMILY: [With a sigh] I know.—Look, they're finished. They're going.

MRS. GIBBS: Sh—.

[The umbrellas leave the stage. Dr. Gibbs comes over to his wife's grave and stands before it a moment. Emily looks up at his face. Mrs. Gibbs does not raise her eyes]

EMILY: Look! Father Gibbs is bringing some of my flowers to you. He looks just like George, doesn't he? Oh, Mother Gibbs, I never realized before how troubled and how . . . how in the dark live persons are. From morning till night, that's all they are—troubled. [Dr. Gibbs goes off]

THE DEAD: Little cooler than it was.—Yes, that rain's cooled it off a little. Those North East winds always do the same thing, don't they? If it isn't a rain, it's a three-day blow.—Reckon it may clear up before night; often does.

[A patient calm falls on the stage. The Stage Manager appears at his proscenium pillar, smoking. Emily sits up abruptly with an idea]

EMILY: But, Mother Gibbs, one can go back, one can go back there again . . . into living. I feel it. I know it. Why just then for a moment I was thinking about . . . about the farm . . . and for a minute I was there, and my baby was on my lap as plain as day.

MRS. GIBBS: Yes, of course you can.

EMILY: I can go back there and live all those days over again . . . why not?

MRS. GIBBS: All I can say is, Emily, don't.

EMILY: [Takes a few steps toward the Stage Manager] But it's true, isn't it? I can go and live . . . back there . . . again.

STAGE MANAGER: Yes, some have tried—but they soon come back here.

MRS. GIBBS: Don't do it, Emily.

MRS. SOAMES: Emily, don't. It's not what you think it'd be.

EMILY: But I won't live over a sad day. I'll choose a happy one—I'll choose the day I first knew that I loved George. Why should that be painful? [They are silent. Her question turns to the Stage Manager] STAGE MANAGER: You not only live it; but you watch yourself living it.

EMILY: Yes?

STAGE MANAGER: And as you watch it, you see the thing that they—down there—never know. You see the future. You know what's going to happen afterwards.

EMILY: But is that—painful? Why?

MRS. GIBBS: That's not the only reason why you shouldn't do it, Emily. When you've been here longer you'll see that our life here is our hope that soon we'll forget all that, and think only of what's ahead, and be ready for what's ahead. When you've been here longer you'll understand.

EMILY: [Softly] But, Mother Gibbs, how can I ever forget that life? It's all I know. It's all I had. [Mrs. Gibbs does not answer] Mr. Stimson, did you go back?

SIMON STIMSON: [Sharply] No. EMILY: Did you, Mrs. Soames?

MRS. SOAMES: Oh, Emily. It isn't wise. Really, it isn't. All we can do is just warn you. It won't be what you expect.

EMILY: [Slowly] But it's a thing I must know for myself. I'll choose a happy day, anyway.

MRS. GIBBS: No. At least, choose an unimportant day. Choose the least important day in your life. It will be important enough.

EMILY: [To the Stage Manager] Then it can't be since I was married; or since the baby was born. I can choose a birthday at least, can't I?—I choose my twelfth birthday.

STAGE MANAGER: All right. February 11th, 1899. A Tuesday.—Do you want any special time of day? EMILY: Oh, I want the whole day.

STAGE MANAGER: We'll begin at dawn. You remember it had been snowing for several days; but it had stopped the night before, and they had begun clearing the roads. The sun's coming up.

EMILY: [With a cry] There's Main Street . . . why, that's Mr. Morgan's drugstore before he changed it! . . . And there's the livery stable. [She walks toward the back of the stage]

STAGE MANAGER: Yes, it's 1899. This is fourteen years ago.

EMILY: Oh, that's the town I knew as a little girl. And, look, there's the old white fence that used to be around our house. Oh, I'd forgotten that! Oh, I love it so! Are they inside?

STAGE MANAGER: Yes, your mother'll be coming downstairs in a minute to make breakfast.

EMILY: [Softly] Will she?

STAGE MANAGER: And you remember: your father had been away for several days; he came back on the early morning train.

EMILY: No . . . ?

STAGE MANAGER: He'd been back to his college to make a speech—in Western New York, at Clinton.

EMILY: Look! There's Howie Newsome. There's our policeman. But he's dead; he died.

[The Stage Manager retires to his corner. The voices of Howie Newsome, Constable Warren and Joe Crowell, Jr., are heard at the left of the stage]

HOWIE NEWSOME: Whoa, Bessie!—Bessie! 'Morning, Bill.

BILL: Morning, Howie.

HOWIE NEWSOME: You're up early.

BILL: Been rescuin' a party; darn near froze to death, down by Polish Town thar. Got drunk and lay out in the snowdrifts. Thought he was in bed when I shook'm.

EMILY: Why, there's Joe Crowell. . . .

JOE CROWELL: Good morning, Mr. Warren. 'Morning, Howie.

[Mrs. Webb has appeared in her kitchen, but Emily does not see her until she calls]

MRS. WEBB: Chil-dren! Wally! Emily! . . . Time to get up.

EMILY: Mama, here I am! Oh! how young Mama looks! I didn't know Mama was ever that young. Oh!

MRS. WEBB: You can come and dress by the kitchen fire, if you like; but hurry. [Howie Newsome has entered along Main Street and brings the milk to Mrs. Webb's door] Good morning, Mr. Newsome. Whhhh—it's cold.

HOWIE NEWSOME: Ten below by my barn, Mrs. Webb

MRS. WEBB: Think of it! Keep yourself wrapped up. [She takes her bottles in, shuddering]

EMILY: [With an effort] Mama, I can't find my blue hair ribbon anywhere.

MRS. WEBB: Just open your eyes, dear, that's all. I laid it out for you special—on the dresser, there. If it were a snake it would bite you.

EMILY: Yes, yes. . . . [She puts her hand on her heart. Mr. Webb comes along Main Street, where he meets Constable Warren]

MR. WEBB: Good morning, Bill.

BILL: Good morning, Mr. Webb. You're up early.
MR. WEBB: Yes, just been back to my old college in New York State. Been any trouble here?

BILL: Well, I was called up this mornin' to rescue a Polish fella—darn near froze to death he was.

MR. WEBB: We must get it in the paper.

BILL: 'Twan't much.

EMILY: [Whispers] Papa. [Mr. Webb shakes the snow off his feet and enters his house]

MR. WEBB: Good morning, Mother. MRS. WEBB: How did it go, Charles?

MR. WEBB: Oh, fine, I guess. I told'm a few things. MRS. WEBB: Did you sit up on the train all night? MR. WEBB: Yes. Never could sleep on a Pullman anyway.

MRS. WEBB: Charles, seems to me—we're rich enough so that you could sleep in a train once in a while.

MR. WEBB: Everything all right here?

MRS. WEBB: Yes—can't think of anything that's happened, special. Been right cold. Howie Newsome says it's ten below over to his barn.

MR. WEBB: Yes, well, it's colder than that at Hamilton College. Students' ears are falling off. It ain't Christian.—Paper have any mistakes in it?

MRS. WEBB: None that I noticed. Coffee's ready when you want it. [He starts upstairs] Charles! Don't forget; it's Emily's birthday. Did you remember to get her something?

MR. WEBB: [Patting his pocket] Yes, I've got something here.

MRS. WEBB: Goodness sakes! I hope she likes what I got for her. I hunted hard enough for it. Children! Hurry up! Hurry up!

MR. WEBB: Where's my girl? Where's my birthday girl? [He goes off left]

MRS. WEBB: Don't interrupt her now, Charles. You can see her at breakfast. She's slow enough as it is. Hurry up, children! It's seven o'clock. Now, I don't want to call you again.

EMILY: [Softly, more in wonder than in grief] I can't bear it. They're so young and beautiful. Why did they ever have to get old? Mama, I'm here. I'm grown up. I love you all, everything.—I can't look at everything hard enough. There's the butternut tree. [She wanders up Main Street] There's Mr. Morgan's drugstore. And there's the High School, forever and ever, and ever. And there's the Congregational Church where I got married. Oh, dear. Oh, dear! [The Stage Manager beckons partially to her. He points to the house. She says a breathless "yes" and goes to the house] Good morning, Mama.

MRS. WEBB: [At the foot of the stairs, kissing her in a matter-of-fact way] Well, now, dear, a very happy birthday to my girl and many happy returns. There are some surprises waiting for you on the kitchen table.

EMILY: Oh, Mama, you shouldn't have. [She throws an anguished glance at the Stage Manager] I can't.—I can't.

MRS. WEBB: [Facing the audience, over her stove] But birthday or no birthday, I want you to eat your breakfast good and slow. I want you to grow up and be a good strong girl. [She goes to the stairs and calls] Wally! Wally, wash yourself good. Everything's getting cold down here. [She returns to the stove with her back to Emily. Emily opens her parcels] That in the blue paper is from your Aunt Carrie and I reckon you can guess who brought the post card album. I found it on the doorstep when I brought in the milk—George Gibbs . . . must have come over in the cold pretty early . . . right nice of him.

EMILY: [To herself] Oh, George; I'd forgotten that...

MRS. WEBB: Chew that bacon slow. It'll help keep you warm on a cold day.

EMILY: [Beginning softly but urgently] Oh, Mama, just look at me one minute as though you really saw me. Mama, fourteen years have gone by. I'm dead. You're a grandmother, Mama. I married George Gibbs, Mama. Wally's dead, too. Mama, his appendix burst on a camping trip to North Conway. We felt just terrible about it—don't you remember? But, just for a moment now we're all together. Mama, just for a moment we're happy. Let's look at one another.

MRS. WEDB: That in the yellow paper is something I found in the attic among your grandmother's things. You're old enough to wear it now, and I thought you'd like it.

EMILY: And this is from you. Why, Mama, it's lovely and it's just what I wanted. It's beautiful! [She flings her arms around her mother's neck. Her mother goes on with her cooking, but is pleased]

MRS. WEBB: Well, I hoped you'd like it. Hunted all over. Your Aunt Norah couldn't find one in Concord, so I had to send all the way to Boston [Laughing] Wally has something for you, too. He made it at Manual Training Class and he's very proud of it. Be sure you make a big fuss about it.—Your father has a surprise for you, too; don't know what it is myself. Sh—here he comes.

MR. WEBB: [Off stage] Where's my girl? Where's my birthday girl?

EMILY: [In a loud voice to the Stage Manager] I can't. I can't go on. Oh! Oh. It goes so fast. We don't have time to look at one another. [She breaks down sobbing. At a gesture from the Stage Manager, Mrs. Webb disappears] I didn't realize. So all that was going on and we never noticed. Take me backup the hill-to my grave. But first: Wait! One more look. Good-by, Good-by, world. Good-by, Grover's Corners . . . Mama and Papa. Good-by to clocks ticking . . . and Mama's sunflowers. And food and coffee. And new-ironed dresses and hot baths . . . and sleeping and waking up. Oh, earth, you're too wonderful for anybody to realize you. [She looks toward the Stage Manager and asks abruptly, through her tears] Do any human beings ever realize life while they live it?-every, every minute?

STAGE MANAGER: No. [Pause] The saints and poets, maybe—they do some.

EMILY: I'm ready to go back. [She returns to her chair beside Mrs. Gibbs] Mother Gibbs, I should have listened to you. Now I want to be quiet for a while.—Oh, Mother Gibbs, I saw it all. I saw your garden.

MRS. GIBBS: Did you, dear?

EMILY: That's all human beings are!—Just blind people.

MRS. GIBBS: Look, it's clearing up. The stars are coming out.

EMILY: Oh, Mr. Stimson, I should have listened to them.

SIMON STIMSON: [With mounting violence; bitingly] Yes, now you know. Now you know! That's what it was to be alive. To move about in a cloud of ignorance; to go up and down trampling on the feelings of those... of those about you. To spend and waste time as though you had a million years. To be always at the mercy of one self-centered passion, or another. Now you know—that's the happy existence you wanted to go back and see. Did you shout to 'em? Did you call to 'em?

EMILY: Yes, I did.

SIMON STIMSON: Now you know them as they are: in ignorance and blindness.

MRS. GIBBS: [Spiritedly] Simon Stimson, that ain't the whole truth and you know it.

[The dead have begun to stir]

THE DEAD: Lemuel, wind's coming up, seems like.

Oh, dear,—I keep remembering things tonight.—
It's right cold for June, ain't it?

MRS. GIBBS: Look what you've done, you and your rebellious spirit stirring us up here.—Emily, look at that star. I forget its name.

THE DEAD: I'm getting to know them all, but I don't know their names.—My boy Joel was a sailor,—knew 'em all. He'd set on the porch evenings and tell 'em all by name. Yes sir, it was wonderful.—A star's mighty good company.—Yes, yes.—Yes, 'tis. SIMON STIMSON: Here's one of them coming.

THE DEAD: That's funny. 'Taint no time for one of them to be here.—Goodness sakes.

EMILY: Mother Gibbs, it's George.

MRS. GIBBS: Sh, dear. You just rest yourself. EMILY: It's George. [George enters from the left, and slowly comes toward them]

A MAN FROM AMONG THE DEAD: And my boy, Joel, who knew the stars—he used to say it took millions of years for that speck o' light to git to the earth. Don't seem like a body could believe it, but that's what he used to say—millions of years.

ANOTHER: That's what they say.

[George flings himself on Emily's grave]
THE DEAD: Goodness! That ain't no way to behave!—He ought to be home.

EMILY: Mother Gibbs? MRS. GIBBS: Yes, Emily?

EMILY: They don't understand much, do they? MRS. GIBBS: No, dear, not very much.

[The Stage Manager appears at the right, one hand on a dark curtain which he slowly draws across the scene. In the distance a clock is heard striking the hour very faintly]

STAGE MANAGER: Most everybody's asleep in Grover's Corners. There are a few lights on: Shorty Hawkins, down at the depot, has just watched the Albany train go by. And at the livery stable somebody's setting up late and talking.—Yes, it's clearing up. There are the stars—doing their old, old crisscross journeys in the sky. Scholars haven't settled the matter yet, but they seem to think there are no living beings up there. They're just chalk . . . or fire. Only this one is straining away, straining away all the time to make something of itself. The strain's so bad that every sixteen hours everybody lies down and gets a rest. [He winds his watch] Hm. . . Eleven o'clock in Grover's Corners.—You get a good rest, too. Good night.

THE END

Clifford Odets

(1906-----)

Ilifford Odets was in his early twenties when the depression struck America, during the autumn of 1929. Born in Philadelphia, he was brought up in the mixed proletarian and lower-middle-class life of the Bronx, in New York City, and considered himself, despite the comparative prosperity of his father, a spiritual brother of the restive poor. After graduation from high school, he dabbled in writing and became an actor, but he achieved no particular success. Fortunately, he joined a junior acting company of the Theatre Guild which acquired three very able and progressive leaders: Cheryl Crawford, Lee Strasberg, and Harold Clurman. Under their guidance, this studio company broke off from the parent organization and blossomed forth as the independent Group Theatre, in 1931. Odets was one of the founders of this organization and modestly participated in the Group's effort to adapt to American conditions the famous "Stanislavsky system" of ensemble playing. He also began to write a play with an eye to the capacities of his fellow actors, completing for them a draft of Awake and Singl entitled I've Got the Blues. It was a sorrowful account of the misery and restlessness of a poor Bronx family during the depression. Odets' colleagues were interested in the mournful play but not at all confident that it could succeed on the stage.

New developments in the theatrical world combined to give the young playwright a hearing. By 1935 the American theatre was in the throes of insurgency, and the New Theatre League, an outgrowth of numerous social-minded groups, was offering prizes for one-act plays. Odets locked himself in a hotel room for three days and turned out a panoramic treatment of a taxicab strike, Waiting for Lefty, which won the first prize for its vivid picture of the depression period. The dramatic form of Waiting for Lefty, which presented a strike meeting as a frame for flashbacks into the experience of the speakers, was effectively theatrical, and the dialogue was remarkably colorful and explosive. When the play was produced by the New Theatre League with Group Theatre actors, it was instantly acclaimed as a tour de force even by those who did not subscribe to its advocacy of class conflict.

The success of Waiting for Lefty prompted the Group Theatre to give this long one-act play a Broadway production, and, in order to round out the evening, Odets added a stirring short dramatization of the conflict between liberalism and fascism in Germany, Till the Day I Die. During the same season, moreover, his fellow players brushed the dust off his full-length family picture, now supplied with a revolutionary varnish and given the new title Awake and Sing! The production at once revealed new and even more remarkable facets of Odets' talent. The play concluded, it is true, with vague conversions to radicalism, but it also possessed more noteworthy and less superimposed qualities-namely. humor, insight, and compassion. Drawn with exceptional verisimilitude, the characters revealed themselves as frustrated yet irrepressible human beings, and their separate lives were woven together by Odets with much skill. Critics acclaimed Awake and Sing! as a rare, Chekhovian play, and Odets was securely launched on a career which brought him acclaim as the most promising young American playwright since the advent of O'Neill, some fifteen years earlier. Although the claims of some admirers proved extravagant, it is entirely true that Odets was the most talented writer discovered by the theatre of the depression generation.

Each of Odets' plays embodied some basic criticism of a society dominated by individualism and a laissez-faire philosophy. Waiting for Lefty was as violently anticapitalistic and prolabor as Till the Day I Die was passionately antifascist. Awake and Sing!, although anything but one-dimensional drama, attacked the middle-class family as a major source of human frustration. Paradise Lost (1936) presented the proposition that the middle class was dying, and Golden Boy (1937) promoted the thesis that our materialistic society diverted men from humanly satisfying modes of self-realization. Rocket to the Moon (1938) propounded the view that economic insecurity inhibits the full flowering of the human personality, and Night Music (1940) dramatized the theme of homelessness in modern society. The author of these plays considered himself the chronicler of a dying social order, and the two plays he contributed to the next decade of American theatre-Clash by Night (1941) and The Big Knife (1949)—also examined manifestations of decay. The former treated a domestic triangle as an effect of unemployment, with the humiliation of the "little man," the husband, culminating in his going berserk; the story implied a parallel to the manner in which common men had managed to translate their frustrations into violence in European fascist movements. The Big Knife was not only an exposé of Hollywood but dramatized the problem of artistic integrity in a world which buys and sells talent.

It is plain, then, that the social motivation of Odets' writing cannot be entirely ignored. He wrote with an animus, and his buoyancy as a writer depended largely on his confidence that his criticism was called for, that he was uncovering the source of evil and suffering, and that he was at the same time celebrating the growth of some show of resistance, understanding, or sheer idealism among common people. It is significant, in fact, that his plays succeeded only when he was supported by the social enthusiasms of his youth and by those of the theatre for which he wrote between 1935 and 1940. When, after spending a decade in Hollywood as a writer and producer, Odets severed connections with the film industry, vowing never to have any traffic with it, he found it difficult to re-establish himself in the theatre with The Big Knife. The play called attention to weaknesses one had tended to overlook in the early Odets plays because their enthusiasm for life and ideals had been affecting or contagious. Odets had been something more than a writer of routine obituaries on men and capitalism. Even the quietest of his early plays, Rocket to the Moon, had been charged with sympathy for those who refuse to be defeated by economic circumstances and personal difficulties.

The two full-length plays with which Odets made himself best known as the exponent of a new, socially charged dramatic style were Awake and Sing! and Golden Boy. The former is the more spontaneous work; it is more richly characterized, more moving, and also less calculated. It also happens to be less representative of American social reality and more dependent upon local color for its argument. Golden Boy, written later, is Odets' bestconstructed play. Here Odets selected broadly familiar American material, celebrated in the sportingnews columns and in film stories. He transfigured the material with the help of his metaphorical cast of mind and his vigorous, if often uneven, dialogue. The result was an angular and provocative variant of the success-story theme of fiction and films, a work vividly realistic and at the same time always suggestive of larger experience and of ideas applicable to society as a whole. Golden Boy proved to be Odets' most successful play, and it was his only full-length play to be seen by any large segment of the playgoing public outside New York. He had offered it as a sort of American saga, and it was received as such, although with less enthusiasm for his sociological intention than he might have wished.

To insist on the allegory of the "the fiddle and the fist" in Golden Boy is to invite argument, since it is easy enough to accept the play as simply an exciting story of the ring, written with more than usual insight. Yet the early draft of Golden Boy carried the subtitle "A Modern Allegory," and the play was treated as such by its director, Harold Clurman, and its scene designer, Mordecai Gorelik. It is plain that Odets opposed two ways of life—the creative and the destructive, the socially desirable and the socially undesirable—in the story of Joe Bonaparte, who loved music but became a killer in the ring. As Clurman explained in a preface to the published version, this prize-fight drama was intended as "the picture of a great fight—a fight in which we are all involved, whatever our profession or craft."

To what extent the allegorical intention is supported by the characterization is an interesting question. It is true, for instance, that Odets the social critic showed the "golden boy" becoming a fighter in order to free himself from the scorn attached to "nobodies," especially if they belong to racial minorities. But is it true, as Clurman asserts, that in order to achieve success the boy "must exploit an accidental attribute of his make-up, a mere skill, and abandon the development of his real self"? Is Joe's "real" self one thing and his skill in the ring another? Is it credible that the boy who was a gifted violinist could become a successful boxer? These and other questions we may raise in connection with the story indicate the difficulty of relating allegory to convincing psychological drama. It was a difficulty Odets rarely succeeded in overcoming when he tried to compose social parables.

With or without its allegorical connotations, Golden Boy is representative of the charged dramatic realism of the theatre of the nineteen-thirties. But, even more important, the play reveals those qualities of talent that differentiated its author from the ordinary writers of social harangues and blueprints for the noncapitalistic millenium. As Brooks Atkinson noted, "Odets does not discuss the idea in Golden Boy so much as he shows it." And Odets "shows it" with the full exercise of his talent for interweaving related themes and situations and, above all, for letting life flow from various directions in a stream often unexpectedly fresh and strangely moving. The characters assert themselves regardless of argument, and we may wonder how it is that they possess so much individuality while their author insists on the theory that they are the product of social pressures. Poor or rich, failures or successes, Odets' characters are irrepressible because they were born alive in their author's memory and imagination. Odets could not have written pat problem plays with such characters, even if he had wanted to do so out of a desire to serve the theatre of "social consciousness." Golden Boy arouses interest largely because the thesis drama becomes a fugue again and again, with life providing the variations. And the writing is, characteristically for the young Odets, both concrete and elliptical; it is a poet's kind of writing.

ACT I. SCENE I.

The small Broadway office of Tom Moody, the fight manager. The office is scantily furnished, contains desk, chairs, telephone and couch. With Moody at present is his girl, Lorna Moon. There is a certain quiet glitter about this girl, and if she is sometimes hard, it is more from necessity than choice. Her eyes often hold a soft, sad glance. Likewise, Moody's explosiveness covers a soft, boyish quality, and at the same time he possesses a certain vulnerable quality which women find very attractive. The time is eighteen months ago. As the lights fade in, we catch these two at the height of one of their frequent fights.

MOODY: Pack up your clothes and go! Go! Who the hell's stopping you? LORNA: You mean it?

MOODY: You brought up the point yourself.

LORNA: No, I didn't!

MOODY: Didn't you say you had a good mind to leave me?

LORNA: No, I said-

MOODY: You said you were going to pack!

LORNA: I said I feel like a tramp and I don't like it. I want to get married, I want-

MOODY: Go home, Lorna, go home! I ain't got time to discuss it. Gimme some air. It's enough I got my wife on my neck.

LORNA: What does she say?

MOODY: Who?

LORNA: Your wife—your sweet goddam Monica! Moody: She wants five thousand dollars to give me the divorce. [Lorna laughs] I don't see that it's funny.

LORNA: Look, Tom, this means as much to me as it does to you. If she's out of the way, we can get married. Otherwise I'm a tramp from Newark. I don't like the feeling.

MOODY: Lorna, for Pete's sake, use your noodle!

When I get rid of Monica, we'll marry. Now, do I have to bang you on the nose to make you understand?

LORNA: Go to hell! . . . But come back tonight. [Moody's answer is to look at her, then smile, then walk to her. They kiss]

MOODY: If I had the money, I'd buy you something—I don't know what—a big ostrich feather! If Kaplan wins tonight, I'll take you dancing at the Park.

LORNA: He won't win.

MOODY: How do you know? I don't know—how do you know?

LORNA: Are you crazy? Do you think your Mr. Kaplan can go ten rounds with the Baltimore Chocolate Drop?

MOODY: How do I know?

LORNA: It's the Twentieth Century, Tom—no more miracles. [Moody's face turns worried. Lorna smiles] You know what I like about you—you take everything so serious.

MOODY: Who will if I don't? I've been off the gold standard for eight years. This used to be a gorgeous town. New York was hot with money. Kaplan gets four hundred bucks tonight. In the old days, that was nothing. Those were the days when I had Marty Welch, the heavyweight contender—Cy Webster who got himself killed in a big, red Stutz. In '27 and 8 you couldn't go to sleep—the town was crawling with attractions.

LORNA: My mother died in '28.

MOODY: I haven't had a break in years. "Carry me back to old Virginny"—that's how I feel. There isn't much of a future. [Suddenly despondent, Moody goes back to his desk]

LORNA: I was fooling. MOODY: What about?

LORNA: Do you think I'd leave you?

MOODY: Why not? I'm an old man. What can I give you?

LORNA: A bang on the nose for a start. But what can I give you?

MOODY: A boy who can fight. Find me a good black boy and I'll show you a mint.

LORNA: Are good boys so hard to find?

MOODY: Honest to God, you make me sick to my stomach! What do you think I took a trip to Philadelphia? What do you think I went to Chicago? Wasn't I up in Boston for a week? You think good boys are laying around like pop-corn? I'd even take a bantamweight, if I found one.

LORNA: How about a nice lady fighter with a beard—[Preparing to leave] Well, I'll see you tonight, Moody.

MOODY: [Thoughtfully] I'd give me right eye for a good black boy.

LORNA: Let me have your right eye for a minute. [She kisses his eye. Moody begins to embrace her—she eludes his grasp] That's to keep you hot. But if the truth were known—"yours till hell freezes over."

MOODY: I need you, I need you, Lorna—I need you all the time. I'd like to give you everything you want. Push your mouth over. . . .

[Lorna holds her face to his; he kisses her. Suddenly a youth is standing at the office door. Lorna sees him and breaks away]

BOY: [Breathing quickly] Mr. Moody . . .

MOODY: [Spinning around] Don't you knock when you come in an office?

BOY: Sometimes I knock, sometimes I don't. MOODY: Say your piece and get the hell out! BOY: I just ran over from the gym . . .

MOODY: What gym?

BOY: Where Kaplan trains. He just broke his hand.... [Moody stiffens to attention] It's a fact.

MOODY: [Grasping the phone] Is Tokio over there?

My trainer?
BOY: He's looking after Kaplan.

[Moody begins to dial the phone but abruptly changes his mind and replaces the phone]

MOODY: You can put me in the bug-house right now. Moody is the name, folks—step right up and wipe your shoes! Ah, that Kaplan! That phonus bolonus! [He sits at his desk in despair] Now I have to call up Roxy Gottlieb and cancel the match. His club's in the red as it is.

BOY: I don't think it's necessary to cancel, Tom. MOODY: [Aware of the Boy for the first time] Oh, you don't? Who the hell are you? And who the hell are you to call me Tom? Are we acquainted?

BOY: I wrote you a couple of letters. I can do that stretch.

MOODY: What stretch?

BOY: Why don't you let me take Kaplan's place tonight?

MOODY: [Sarcastically] Go slow and tell me again . . . what?

BOY: [Coolly] I can take Kaplan's place. . . .

MOODY: You mean you want to fight the Baltimore Chocolate Drop? You? [The Boy remains silent. Moody comes out from behind his desk and stands face to face with the Boy. With sudden discovery] You're cock-eyed too.

BOY: [Quietly] Can't you fix it up with Roxy Gott-lieb?

MOODY: [Suddenly] Looka, kid, go home, kid, before I blame Kaplan's glass mitts on you. Then you won't like it, and I won't like it, and Miss Moon here, she won't like it.

BOY: [Turning to Lorna] How do you do, Miss Moon. [Lorna smiles at the Boy's quiet confidence] I need a good manager, Mr. Moody. You used to be tops around town—everyone says so. I think you can develop me. I can fight. You don't know it, but I can fight. Kaplan's been through for years. He may be the best fighter in your stable, but he's a stumble-bum for the younger boys growing up. Why don't you give me this chance, Tom?

MOODY: I don't want you calling me Tom! [He glares at the Boy and then returns to the desk and telephone

BOY: I'm waiting for your answer. [Moody's answer is an exasperated glance as he begins to dial the phone. The Boy half approaches the desk] There are forty-three thousand minutes in a month—can't you give me five?

MOODY: I'll give you this phone in the head in a minute! Who are you? What the hell do you want? Where do you fight?

BOY: [With cool persistence] We ought to get together, Tom.

MOODY: I don't want you calling me Tom. You're brash, you're fresh, you're callow—and you're cockeyed! In fact, you're an insult to my whole nature! Now get out! [Moody turns back to the phone and begins dialing again. The Boy stands there, poised on his toes, not sure of his next move. He turns and looks at Lorna. She nods her head and gives him a faint smile of encouragement. On phone] This is Tom Moody . . . is Tokio there? . . . [He hangs up the phone and holds the instrument thoughtfully] Tokio's on his way over.

BOY: The Baltimore Chocolate Drop is not as good as you think he is. [Moody suddenly whirls around and holds the telephone high over his head in a threatening gesture. The Boy steps back lightly and continues] I've studied his style for months; I've perfected the exact punch to quench his thirst. Did you ever watch closely? [Acting it out] He likes to pull your lead—he hesitates for a second—he pulls your lead—he slips his face away and then he's in. Suppose you catch that second when he hesitates—he's open for the punch!

MOODY: [Sarcastically] And what do you do with his left hook?

BOY: [Simply] Avoid it.

MOODY: [Lowering the phone] Looka, you idiot, did you ever hear of Phil Mateo?

BOY: I heard of him.

MOODY: The Chocolate Drop marked him lousy in twelve minutes and ten seconds. Was Kid Peters within your ken? And did you ever hear of Eddie Newton? The Chocolate gave him the blues in two rounds. And Frisco Samuels and Mike Mason . . .

BOY: Did you ever hear of me?

MOODY: [Sarcastically] No, who are you? I would honestly like to know—who are you?

BOY: [Quietly] My name is Bonaparte. [Moody howls with laughter, and even Lorna, sympathetic to the Boy, laughs. The Boy continues] I don't think it's funny. . . .

MOODY: Didn't that name used to get you a little giggle in school? Tell the truth, Bonaparte. Didn't it?

BOY: Call me Joe.

MOODY: [Laughing] And your eyes . . . Didn't they used to get a little giggle too?

JOE: You don't seem as intelligent as I thought you were.

LORNA: [To the laughing Moody, seeing the Boy's pain] Stop it, Tom.

MOODY: [Laughing] You can't blame me, Bonaparte. . . . I haven't laughed for years.

JOE: I don't like it. . . . I don't want you to do it. [Suddenly Joe grabs Moody by the coat lapels. Moody, surprised, shakes him off. At the same time a small, quiet man enters the office. He is Tokio, Moody's trainer] I'm sorry I did that, Tom. We ought to be together, Tom—not apart.

MOODY: Tokio, did you send this kid here? TOKIO: No.

MOODY: Take him out before I brain him! [He storms back to his desk]

TOKIO: [After looking at the Boy] You hear about Kaplan?

MOODY: This idiot told me. It's the end of everything! I'm off my top with the whole thing! Kaplan was our meal-ticket. I'm up to the throat in scandal, blackmail, perjury, alimony and all points west!

TOKIO: [Turning to Joe] You oughta be ashamed to show your face in this office.

JOE: If Kaplan's mother fed him milk, he wouldn't have those brittle bones.

MOODY: ? ? ? ?

TOKIO: [To Moody] This is the boy who did it to Kaplan.

MOODY: ? ? ?

TOKIO: I went down for an apple and I come back and Kaplan's sparring with this kid—picked him up in the gym. The next thing I know, Kaplan's down on the floor with a busted mitt.

JOE: [Modestly] I took it on the elbow.

MOODY: !! [Silence finally]

LORNA: Where do you come from, Bonaparte? JOE: Here.

LORNA: How old are you?

JOE: Twenty-one-tomorrow.

MOODY: [After a look at Lorna] Fight much? JOE: Enough.

MOODY: Where?

JOE: [Fabricating] Albany, Syracuse . . .

LORNA: Does Roxy Gottlieb know you?

JOE: I never fought at his club.

MOODY: [Harshly] Does he know you?

JOE: No. [Tokio and Moody look at each other. The phone rings]

MOODY: [On the phone] Hello. . . . "What's this you hear?" . . . You hear the truth, Roxy. . . . He bust his mitt again. . . . I can't help it if you got fifty judgments on your club. . . . The same to you. Your mother too! [Keeping his eyes on Bonaparte] If you tie up your big flabby mouth for a minute, I'll give you some news. I'm in a position to do you a big favor. I got a replacement—better than Kaplan . . . Bonaparte. . . . No, Bon-a-parte. [Holds hand over mouthpiece and asks Boy] Is that crap?

JOE: No, that's my name.

MOODY: [Back at phone] That's right, like in Napoleon. . . . [Looks the Boy over appraisingly] One hundred and thirty

JOE: Three.

MOODY: Hundred and thirty-three. Your customers'll eat him up. I'll bring him right over . . . you can take my word—the kid's a cock-eyed wonder . . . your mother too! [He hangs up and turns around. Joe is the focus of all eyes] It's revenge on somebody—maybe God.

JOE: [Quietly] I think you'll be surprised.

MOODY: [Sadly] Do your worst, kid. I've been surprised by experts.

JOE: Don't worry, Tom.

MOODY: Call me Tom again and I'll break your

QUICK FADEOUT

SCENE II.

Later that night. The combination dining and front room of the Bonaparte home. A round diningroom table, littered with newspapers, is lighted from directly above like a billiard table. Plaster busts of Mozart and Beethoven are on the sideboard. A cage of love birds at the other side of the room. Sitting at the table are two men: Mr. Bonaparte, the father of Joe, and a Jewish friend, a Mr. Carp, who owns the local candy and stationery store. As the lights fade in, Mr. Bonaparte turns his newspaper. Mr. Carp is slowly pouring beer from a bottle. He begins to sip it as Siggie, Mr. Bonaparte's son-in-law, enters from the kitchen. He is barefooted, dressed in an undershirt, trousers and hung-down suspenders. He brings his own beer and glass, which he begins to fill with an expert's eye. In the silence, Mr. Carp takes a long, cool sip of beer combined with a murmur of relish.

CARP: [Finally] I don't take it easy. That's my trouble—if I could only learn to take it easy. . . .

SIGGIE: What do you call it now, what you're doing?

CARP: Say, it's after business hours.

siggie: That's a business? A man who runs a candy store is an outcast of the world. Don't even sell nickel candies—penny candies!

CARP: And your taxicab business makes you higher in the social scale?

SIGGIE: So I'm an outcast too. Don't change the subject. Like my father-in-law here—he's always changing the subject when I get a little practical on him. [Putting his beer on the table and scratching himself under the arms like a monkey] You—I'm talking about you, Mr. Bonaparte.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Suddenly shooting out two words] Ha ha! [He then resumes his reading]

SIGGIE: Every time I talk money, he gives me that horse laugh. Suppose you bought me a cab—I could pay it off by the week.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Who talks with an Italian accent] I don't go in taxicab business.

siggie: I am married to your daughter and when you do this little thing, you do it for her and me together. A cab in two shifts is a big source of profit. Joe takes the night shift. I'm a married man so you don't expect me to take the night shift. [Anna, Siggie's wife, in a night-gown, pokes her head in at the door]

ANNA: Come to bed, Siggie. You'll wake up the whole neighborhood. [Anna disappears]

SIGGIE: See? I'm a married man! You don't expect me to take the night shift.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Having heard this talk for months] No, Siggie . . . no.

SIGGIE: No, what?

MR. BONAPARTE: No taxicab.

siggie: Don't you wanna help your own family, foolish? After all, Joe's your own son—he's a man, no kid no more—

MR. BONAPARTE: Tomorrow's twenty-one.

SIGGIE: If he don't work he'll turn into a real bum. Look how late he's staying out at night.

MR. BONAPARTE: I don't expects for Joe to drive taxi.

SIGGIE: He's got to do something. He can drive like a fire engine. Why not?

MR. BONAPARTE: He gonna do something.

SIGGIE: What? Play his violinsky in the backyards? ANNA: [Looking in at the door again] Come to bed, Siggie! Poppa, don't talk to him so he'll come to bed! [Anna disappears again]

SIGGIE: [Annoyed] Women! Always buzzing around. [Mr. Bonaparte's only answer is to turn over the newspaper on the table before him] carp: [Reflectively] Women . . . the less we have to do with women the better. As Schopenhauer says, "Much ado about nothing . . . the comedy of reproduction." [He wags his head bitterly] Women . . . !

SIGGIE: I'm hungry, but I ain't got the heart to go in the kitchen again. It reminds me of how my wife slaves for this family of crazy wops! A fine future for an intelligent woman!

MR. BONAPARTE: She'sa your wife, but also my daughter. She'sa not so intelligent as you say. Also, you are not so intelligent!

SIGGIE: You can't insult me, I'm too ignorant!

[Anna now comes fully into the room. She is buxom, energetic, good-natured and adenoidal]
ANNA: Poppa, why don't you let Siggie come to bed? Looka him, walking around barefooted!

MR. BONAPARTE: I don't stop him. . . .

SIGGIE: Sure he stops me—he stops me every night. I'm worried. I don't sleep. It's my Jewish disposition. He don't wanna help me out, your old man. He wants me to drive a company cab and submit to the brutalities of the foremen all my life. I could be in a healthy little enterprise for myself, but your old man don't wanna help me out.

ANNA: Why don't you buy Siggie a cab, Poppa? You got the cash.

SIGGIE: Buy it for Siggie and Joe.

ANNA: For Siggie and Joe—it don't have to be a new one.

SIGGIE: [After giving his wife a stabbing glance] Sure, even an old one—the way they recondition them now-a-days—

MR. BONAPARTE: Children, gone to bed.

SIGGIE: Don't tell a lie—how much you got in the bank?

MR. BONAPARTE: [With a smile] Millions.

SIGGIE: Four thousand? MR. BONAPARTE: No.

SIGGIE: Three? [Mr. Bonaparte shakes his head] Three? . . .

ANNA: What's your business how much he's got? SIGGIE: Shut up, Duchess! Am I asking for my health? If I wanna take you out of the kitchen, is that the gratitude I get? You and your father, you get my goat! I'm sore!

ANNA: Come to bed, Siggie.

siggie: "Come to bed, come to bed!" What the hell's so special in bed. [Anna's answer is a warm prolonged giggle] It's a conspiracy around here to put me to bed. I'm warning one thing: if matters go from worse to worse, don't ever expect me to support this family, I'm warning!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Smiling kindly] We have-a receive the warning. We are in a conspiracy against you—gone to bed. [He turns back to his newspaper. Siggie sees he has lost again and now turns on his wife] siggie: Who asked you to stick in your two cents about secondhand cabs? As long as I'm not gonna get it, I'll tell you what I want—a first-class job, fresh from the factory. [He suddenly swats her on the head with a rolled-up newspaper. She hits him back. He returns her blow]

ANNA: Don't be so free with your hands! [He hits her again. She hits him back] You got some nerve, Siggie!

SIGGIE: [Hitting her again] The next time I'll break your neck—I'm super-disgusted with you!

MK. BONAPARTE: [Standing up] Stop this . . .

siggie: [Turning to him] And with you, I'm superfinished! [Turning back to his wife] Sit out here with this Unholy Alliance—I'll sleep alone tonight. [He warts for the door. Mr. Bonaparte puts his arm around Anna who begins to sob]

MR. BONAPARTE: Hit your wife in private, not in public!

CARP: A man hits his wife and it is the first step to fascism!

stocke: [To Carp] What are you talking about, my butle, wince! I love my wife. You don't stop talking how you hate yours. [Now to Mr. Bonaparte] And as for you, don't make believe you care!—Do I to fall on my knees to you otherwise? We wanna raise a family—it's a normal instinct. Take your arm off her.

ANNA: [Suddenly moving over to Siggie] That's right, poppa. He can hit me any time he likes.

SIGGIE: [His arm around her] And we don't want you interfering in our affairs unless you do it the right way!

ANNA: That's right, poppa—you mind your g.d. business! [Mr. Bonaparte repressing a smile, slowly sits]

SIGGIE: In the bed, Duchess.

ANNA: [With a giggle] Good night.

MR. BONAPARTE and MR. CARP: Good night. [She exits. After a belligerent look at the pair at the table, Siggie follows her]

MR. BONAPARTE: [Bursting into hushed laughter] There'sa olda remark—never interfere in the laws of nature and you gonna be happy. Love! Ha ha!

CARP: [Gloomily] Happy? A famous man remarked in the last century. "Pleasure is negative."

MR. BONAPARTE: I feela good. Like-a to have some music! Hey, where's my boy Joe? [Looks at his watch; is surprised] One o'clock . . . don't come home yet. Hey, he make-a me worry!

CARP: You think you got worries? Wait, you're a young man yet. You got a son, Joe. He practised on his fiddle for ten years? He won a gold medal, the best in the city? They gave him a scholarship in the Erickson Institute? Tomorrow he's twenty-one, yeah?

MR. BONAPARTE: [Emphatically] Yeah!

CARP: [Leaning forward and dramatically making his point] Suppose a war comes? Before you know it, he's in the army!

MR. BONAPARTE: Naw, naw! Whata you say! Naw! CARP: [Wagging his head in imitation] Look in the papers! On every side the clouds of war—

MR. BONAPARTE: My Joe gotta biga talent. Yesterday I buy-a him present! [With a dramatic flourish he brings a violin case out of the bottom part of the sideboard]

CARP: [As the case is opened] It looks like a coffin for a baby.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Looking down at the violin in its case] His teacher help me to picka him.

CARP: [The connoisseur] Fine, fine—beautiful, fine! A cultural thing!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Touching it fondly] The mosta golden present for his birthday which I give him tonight.

CARP: How much, if I'm not getting too personal, did such a violin cost you?

MR. BONAPARTE: Twelve hundred dollars.

CARP: [Shocked] What?

MR. BONAPARTE: You're surprised of me? Well, I waita for this moment many years.

CARP: [Sitting] Ask yourself a pertinent remark: could a boy make a living playing this instrument in our competitive civilization today?

MR. BONAPARTE: Why? Don't expect for Joe to be a millionaire. He don't need it, to be millionaire. A good life's a possible—

CARP: For men like us, yes. But nowadays is it possible for a young man to give himself to the Muses? Could the Muses put bread and butter on the table?

MR. BONAPARTE: No millionaire is necessary. Joe love music. Music is the great cheer-up in the language of all countries. I learn that from Joe.

[Carp sighs as Mr. Bonaparte replaces the violin in the buffet]

CARP: But in the end, as Schopenhauer says, what's the use to try something? For every wish we get, ten remains unsatisfied. Death is playing with us as a cat and her mouse!

MR. BONAPARTE: You make-a me laugh, Mr. Carp. You say life'sa bad. No. life'sa good. Siggie and Anna fight—good! They love—good! You say life'sa bad...well, is pleasure for you to say so. No? The streets, winter a' summer—trees, cats—I love-a them all. The gooda boys and girls, they who sing and whistle—[Bursts into a moment of gay whistling]—very good! The eating and sleeping, drinking wine—very good! I gone around on my wagon and talk to many people—nice! Howa you like the big buildings of the city?

CARP: Buildings? And suppose it falls? A house fell down last week on Staten Island!

MR. BONAPARTE: Ha ha, you make me laugh, ha ha! [Now enters Frank Bonaparte, oldest son of the family, simple, intelligent, observant]

MR. BONAPARTE: Hello, Frank.

FRANK: Hello, poppa . . . Mr. Carp . . . CARP: [Nodding] What's new in the world?

FRANK: [Dropping newspapers to the table, but keeping one for himself] Read 'em and weep. March first tomorrow—spring on the way. Flowers soon budding, birds twittering—south wind . . . Cannons, bombs and airplane raids! Where's Joe? Did you give him the fiddle yet?

MR. BONAPARTE: No, not in yet. Siggie and Anna sleep. Hungry?

FRANK: [Beginning to undress—putting his coat on the back of a chair] No, I'm tired. I'll see you in the morning, before I leave.

CARP: Going away again?

FRANK: South. Tex-tiles. There's hell down there in tex-tiles. [He sits on the other side of the room and looks at a paper]

CARP: I don't begin to understand it—tex-tiles! What's it his business if the workers in tex-tiles don't make good wages!

MR. BONAPARTE: Frank, he fight-a for eat, for good life. Why not!

CARP: Foolish!

MR. BONAPARTE: What ever you got ina your nature to do is a not foolish!

CARP: [Flipping over the newspaper] For instance —look: playing baseball isn't foolish?

MR. BONAPARTE: No, if you like-a to do.

CARP: Look! Four or five pages—baseball—tennis-ball—it gives you an idea what a civilization! You ever seen a baseball game?

MR. BONAPARTE: No.

CARP: [Wagging his head] Hit a ball, catch a ball . . . believe me, my friend—nonsense!

FRANK: Poppa, where did you say Joe was?

MR. BONAPARTE: Don't know-

FRANK: Poppa, you better brace yourself in your chair!

MR. BONAPARTE: What?

[Frank places the paper before Mr. Bonaparte. He reads aloud]

FRANK: Looka this, Joe's had a fight. "Flash: Chocolate Drop fails to K.O. new cock-eyed wonder." Take a look at the picture.

CARP: What?

MR. BONAPARTE: What?

FRANK: It's my little brother Joie, or I don't know a scab from a picket!

MR. BONAPARTE: Had a fight? That is foolish—not possible.

FRANK: [Pointing with his finger] There's his name—Bonaparte.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Puzzled] Musta be some other boy.

[Frank suddenly flips over the newspaper. The others immediately see the reason: Joe stands in the entrance, in the shadows]

JOE: [In the shadows] Gee, you're up late. . . . MR. BONAPARTE: We waita for you.

[Joe slowly moves into the light. His face is bruised and over one eye is a piece of adhesive tape]

JOE: [Seeing their looks] I had a fight—a boy in the park—

MR. BONAPARTE: He hit you?

JOE: I hit him.

MR. BONAPARTE: You hurt?

JOE: No.

[Mr. Bonaparte casts a furtive look in the direction of the other men]

MR. BONAPARTE: Whata you fight him for?

JOE: Didn't like what he said to me.

MR. BONAPARTE: What he said?

JOE: [Evasively] It's a long story and I'm tired.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Trying to break a pause of embarrassment] I was say to Mr. Carp tomorrow is your birthday. How you like to be so old?

JOE: I forgot about that! I mean I forgot for the last few hours. Where do you think I was? Do you want the truth?

FRANK: Truth is cheap. We bought it for two cents. [He turns over the paper and shows Joe his own face. Joe looks at the picture, likes it. General silence]

JOE: [Finally, belligerently] Well, what are you going to do about it?

MR. BONAPARTE: [Still puzzled] Abouta what? JOE: [Challengingly] Tomorrow's my birthday!

FRANK: What's that got to do with being a gladiator?

JOE: [Turning to Frank, with sudden vehemence] Mind your business! You don't know me—I see you once a year; what do you know about me?

FRANK: [Smiling] You're a dumb kid!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Starting to his feet] Hey, waita one-a minute. What'sa for this excitement?

JOE: [Hotly] I don't want to be criticized! Nobody takes me serious here! I want to do what I want. I proved it tonight. I'm good—I went out to earn some money and I earned! I had a professional fight tonight—maybe I'll have some more.

CARP: You honest to God had a fight? JOE: [Glaring at Carp] Why not?

FRANK: [To Joe] No one's criticizin'.

MR. BONAPARTE: That's right.

JOE: [Half sheepishly] I don't know why I got so sore. . . .

FRANK: You're expecting opposition all the time—MR. BONAPARTE: Sit down, Joe—resta you'self.

Joe: Don't want to sit. Every birthday I ever had I sat around. Now'sa time for standing. Poppa, I have to tell you—I don't like myself, past, present and future. Do you know there are men who have wonderful things from life? Do you think they're better than me? Do you think I like this feeling of no possessions? Of learning about the world from Carp's encyclopaedia? Frank don't know what it means—he travels around, sees the world! [Turning to Frank] You don't know what it means to sit around here and watch the months go ticking by! Do you think that's a life for a boy my age? Tomorrow's my birthday! I change my life!

MR. BONAPARTE: Justa like that?

JOE: Just like that!

FRANK: And what do you do with music?

JOE: Who says I'm married to music? I take a vacation—the notes won't run away!

FRANK: You're a mysterious kid. Where did you learn the fighting game?

JOE: These past two years, all over the city—in the gyms—

MR. BONAPARTE: Hey, Joe, you sound alike crazy! You no gotta nature for fight. You're musician. Whata you say, heh? Whata you do?

JOE: Let's call it a day.

MR. BONAPARTE: Isa no true whata I say?—

JOE: That's all for tonight. [His lips tightened, he abruptly exits]

MR. BONAPARTE: [Calling after him] Take a gooda sleep, Joe.

FRANK: [Smiling] It looks like the gold bug has visited our house.

CARP: [Sadly] Fortunes! I used to hear it in my youth—the streets of America is paved with gold. Say, you forgot to give him the present.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Slowly, puzzled] I don'ta know he say he gonna fight. . . .

SLOW FADEOUT

SCENE III.

Two months later; Moody's office as seen before. Moody is pacing back and forth in one of his fuming moods. Those present include Lorna, stretched out on the couch, blowing cigarette smoke into the air; Tokio sitting quietly on the window sill; and Roxy Gottlieb, comfortably spread out in the desk chair, wearing a big white panama hat which he seldom removes.

ROXY: They don't like him. They seen him in five fights already. He's a clever boy, that Bonaparte, and speedy—but he's first-class lousy in the shipping department! I bought a piece of him, so I got a right to say it: a mosquito gives out better! Did you read what he wrote in his column, that Drake? He writes he's a regular "brain trust."

LORNA: What's wrong with that?

ROXY: I'll tell you in a capsule: the people who'll pay to watch a "brain trust" you could fit in a telephone booth! Roxy Gottlieb is telling you!

MOODY: Roxy's right. Joe pulls his punches. Two months already and he don't throw his hands right and he don't throw them enough.

LORNA: Tom, what do you want the boy to do? You surely know by now he's not a slugger. His main asset is his science—he's a student.

ROXY: [Loftily] Excuse me, Miss Moon. In the prizefight ring the cash customer don't look for stoodents. Einstein lives in a college—a wonderful man in his line! Also, while I think of it, a woman's place is in the hay, not in the office!

MOODY: [Indignantly] Where do you come off to make a remark like that?

place is in the bar—see you later. [She looks at the others with a peculiar smile and exits. Moody stares at Roxy who realizes he has said the wrong thing]

MOODY: I'm worried about that boy!

TOKIO: I'd trust him, Tom. Joe knows his own needs, as he says. Don't ask him to change his style. A style is best when it's individual. when it comes out of the inner personality and the lay of the muscles and the set of the bones. That boy stands a chance to make the best lightweight since Benny Simon.

ROXY: On your nose!

TOKIO: He's got one of the best defenses I ever seen. And speedy as the wind.

MOODY: But he won't fight!

ROXY: A momma doll gives out better!

TOKIO: He's a peculiar duck—I want him thinking he's the best thing in shoe leather.

MOODY: He thinks so now.

TOKIO: I don't like to contradict you, Tom, but he don't. It's seventy-five percent front. If you want the goods delivered you have to treat him delicate, gentle—like a girl.

ROXY: Like a girl? Why didn't you say so before? MOODY: No, Roy, not you—you just treat him like a human being.

токю: I think we can begin the build-up now.

MOODY: A road tour?

TOKIO: I'd like to take him around the Middle West, about fifteen bouts.

ROXY: [Answering a look from Moody] I didn't say no. But will he cooperate?

TOKIO: As soon as I find the password.

MOODY: What's the password to make this kid go in and slug—that's the problem. [There is a knock at the door. Moody calls] Yes?

[The door opens and Mr. Bonaparte stands there hesitantly]

MR. BONAPARTE: [Timidly] My name is Joe Bonaparte's father. I come-a to see my son's new friends.

MOODY: [Expansively] Come in, sit down, Mr. Bonaparte.

ROXY: [Sitting comfortably] Take a seat.

MR. BONAPARTE: Am I interrupt?

MOODY: Not at all.

ROXY: What's the matter with your boy?

токіо: [To Mr. Bonaparte] This is Mr. Moody and Mr. Gottlieb.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Sitting] Good afternoon.

MOODY: We were just discussing your son.

MR. BONAPARTE: I please to hear. I like find out from a you how's this boxer business for Joe. Whata good in it for him.

MOODY: Your Joe's a very clever fighter.

ROXY: Can you take it? We want to make your boy famous—a millionaire, but he won't let us—won't cooperate. How do you like it?

MR. BONAPARTE: Why? Whatta he do?

ROXY: [Going over and facing the old man in a lecturing position] I'll ask you. What does he do? What does he do that's right? Nothing! We offer him on a gold platter! Wine, women and song, to make a figure of speech. We offer him magnitudes! . . .

MR. BONAPARTE: [Waiting] Yes—?

MOODY: But he won't fight.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Puzzled] He'sa fighta for you, no?

ROXY: You're right—no! Your boy's got unexplored possibilities—unexplored! But you can't make a purse out of somebody's ear.

MOODY: [Trying to counteract Roxy's volubility] My colleague is trying to say that Joe keeps holding back in the ring.

MR. BONAPARTE: Holda back?
TOKIO: He nurses his self—
MOODY: He keeps holding back—
TOKIO: His defense is brilliant—

MOODY: Gorgeous-!

ROXY: But where's the offense? You take but you can't give. Figure it out—where would you be in a traffic jam? You know how to reverse—but to shift in second or high?—nothing!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Quietly to Roxy] Hey, you talka too much—nobody's contradicta you.

ROXY: [After a momentary setback] "Everybody'sa contradicta me!" Even you, and I never met you before. [With a reproachful glance he retires to the desk where he sits and sulks]

MR. BONAPARTE: [Singling out Tokio as a man to whom he can speak] Who are you?

TOKIO: Your son's trainer. . . .

MR. BONAPARTE: You interest to helpa my boy? TOKIO: [Respectfully] Very much. . . .

MR. BONAPARTE: Me too. Maybe not so as plan by these-a gentleman here. I don't say price fight's a no good for Joe. Joe like-a to be fame, not feel ashame. . . .

TOKIO: Is Joe afraid of his hands?

MR. BONAPARTE: I don't know. You tella me what's what . . . I don't know price fight. His hand could get hurt?

MOODY: Every fighter hurts his hands. Sometimes they break—

TOKIO: They heal up in no time.

ROXY: [Flaring out] What's so special about hands? I suppose your kid plays piano!

MR. BONAPARTE: Coulda get hurt? Coulda break?! ROXY: So what?

MR. BONAPARTE: [Up on his feet] Hey, you! I don't like-a you! You no interest in my boy! [Proudly] My boy'sa besta violin' in New York!

MOODY: [Suddenly sickened] What . . .? MR. BONAPARTE: Yes, play the violin!

MOODY: That's it! . . .

ROXY: [Anguished by this stupidity] If I had hair I'd tear it out! Five hundred fiddlers stand on Broadway and 48th Street, on the corner, every day, rain or shine, hot or cold. And your boy dares—! [Turning to Moody] How do you like it? [He waves his hands in despair and retires to the desk, where he sits in fuming disgusted silence]

MOODY: [Repressing a feeling of triumph] Your boy's afraid of his hands because he fiddles?

MR. BONAPARTE: Yes, musta be!

TOKIO: Why did you come and tell us this?

MR. BONAPARTE: Because I like-a to help my boy. I like-a for him to try himself out. Maybe thisa better business for him. Maybe not. He mus' try to find out, to see whata he want . . . I don't know. Don't help Joe to tell him I come here. Don't say it. [He slowly walks to the door]

MOODY: That means you won't stand in his way?
MR. BONAPARTE: My boy could break his hand?
Gentleman, I'ma not so happy as you . . . no!
[He slowly exits]

MOODY: [Joyously] I'm beginning to see the light! Joe's mind ain't made up that the fist is mightier than the fiddle.

ROXY: [Bouncing up and down] I'll make up his mind. For the money that's involved I'd make Niagara Falls turn around and go back to Canada.

TOKIO: Don't try to bully him into anything ROXY: In Roxy Gottlieb he met his match.

MOODY: [Explosively] What the hell's the matter with you, Roxy! Sit down a minute! [Roxy sits] As I see it, the job is to handle him gently, to make him see how much we prize him—to kill his doubts with goodness.

ROXY: I got it: the password is honey! . . .

MOODY: Right! The Middle West tour is on! Tokio goes along to build up a real offensive. I take care of the newspapers here. Chris', I thought it was something serious! I'm getting to feel like 1928 again. Call it intuition: I feel like the Resurrection. [He gets up and begins to stroll about] Once we're out of the tunnel, with thirty bouts behind us—

ROXY: If you hear a noise, it's my mouth watering—

[The telephone rings. Moody answers]

MOODY: Hello? . . . Yeah . . . I think he'll win— [Hangs up] Who do you think that was? [Imitating] "Fuseli is speaking." Eddic Fuseli!

ROXY: Fuseli? What's he want?

MOODY: Will Joe win against Vincenti Tuesday. Tokio, from now on it's your job.

токю: I got faith in the boy.

MOODY: [To Roxy] I have to ask one thing—when Joe comes over from the gym let me do the talking. ΤΟΚΙΟ: And don't mention music! [Lorna enters] LORNA: Shh! Here's Joe.

[Joe Bonaparte enters the office. Immediately Moody and Roxy put on their softest kid gloves. Their methods of salesmanship will shortly become so apparent that both Joe and Lorna become suspicious]

MOODY: [Slowly circling around] Glad to see you, Joe. Joe, you remember in reference to what we were speaking about yesterday? Well . . . we had several friends on the long distance phone. We're booking fifteen out of town bouts for you. Tough ones, too.

ROXY: Tonight I'm calling my Chicago connections

MOODY: We talked it over with Tokio and he says—well, tell him what you said, Tokio—tell him the truth токю: I think you got a wonderful future.

моору: [To Tokio] Name the names, Tokio. токіо: Well, I said Benny Simon—as good as TOKIO: Well, I said Benny Simon—as good as Simon, I said.

MOODY: Tokio's gonna work with you—help you develop a right—

ROXY: And a left! What's a right without a left? MOODY: Tokio thinks that when he brings you back you'll be a contender for Number One.

JOE: [A little defensively] Really? . . . MOODY: But you have to help us help you.

ROXY: Could Webster say it better?

MOODY: [Softly singing a siren song, his arms around Joe's shoulder] This job needs gorgeous concentration. All your time and thoughts, Joe. No side lines, no side interests—

JOE: [Defensively] I don't go out with girls.

MOODY: You're in the fighting game. It's like being a priest—your work comes first. What would you rather do than fight?

JOE: [Defensively] I don't know what you mean.
MOODY: [Carefully picking his words] Some boys, for instance, like to save their looks. They'd practically throw the fight to keep their nose intact.

JOE: [Smiling wryly] My looks don't interest me. [Lorna is listening with rapt attention]

MOODY: [Still singing the siren song] Then what's holding you back, Joe? You can tell me, Joe. We've set up housekeeping together, Joe, and I want you to tell me if you can't cook a steak—it don't matter. We're married anyway. . . .

JOE: [Uneasily] Who's being put to bed?

MOODY: What do you mean?

JOE: I don't like this seduction scene. [To Tokio] What are they after?

токю: They think you're afraid of your hands.

MOODY: Are you? JOE: Half . . . TOKIO: Why?

ROXY: [Bouncing up] Tell the truth!

JOE: What truth?

MOODY: [Holding back Roxy with a look] Are you afraid your hands'il bust, Joe? [Joe remains silent] What's a busted hand to a fighter? You can't go in and do your best if you're scared of your mitts . . . can you? You tell me. . . .

JOE: No. . .

MOODY: Whyn't you give up outside ideas, Joe? ROXY: [Suddenly, in a loud voice to Tokio] You should seen that bunch of musicians on 48th Street before. Fiddlers, drummers, cornetists—not a dime in a car-load. Bums in the park! Oh, excuse me, Tom, I was just telling Tokio—

[Joe is now aware that the others know of the violin. Now he is completely closed to them. Moody sees this. He says to Roxy]

MOODY: [Wrathfully] What would you like to say, my fine-feathered friend?

ROXY: [Simulating bewilderment] What's the matter? What happened? [Receiving no answer, he looks around several times and adds, with a shrug] I think I'll run across the street and pick up an eight-cylinder lunch.

MOODY: Sprinkle it with arsenic. Do that for me. for me, sweetheart!!

ROXY: [Hurt] That's a fine remark from a friend. [He haughtily exits]

JOE: What do you want, Mr. Moody?

MOODY: At the moment, nothing. I'm puffed out. See you tomorrow over the gym.

JOE: Maybe I won't be there. I might give up fighting as a bad job. I'm not over-convinced it's what I want. I can do other things. . . .

TOKIO: I'll see you tomorrow at the gym, Joe. [Joe looks at both the men, says nothing, exits] That Mr. Gottlieb is a case. See you later.

MOODY: [Not looking up] Okay. [Tokio exits. Lorna and Moody are alone. She blows cigarette smoke to the ceiling. Moody puts his feet up on the desk and leans back wearily. Snorting through his nostrils] The password is honey!

LORNA: What was that all about? [The telephone rings]

MOODY: [Of the ringing bell] If that's for me, tear it up. I ain't in, not even for God.

LORNA: [Answering] Hello? . . . [Putting her hand on the mouthpiece] It's Mrs. God—your wife.

[Moody makes a grimace of distaste but picks up the phone and puts on a sweet voice]

MOODY: Yes, Monica darling. . . . Yeah . . . you and your support. . . . You're gonna fifty-buck me to death! . . . Monica, if I had fifty bucks I'd buy myself a big juicy coffin—what?—so throw me in jail. [He hangs up the phone] Bitch! That'll be time number three. She means it too.

LORNA: What was that scene with Bonaparte?

MOODY: Sweetheart, the jig is up! Believe it or not, Bonaparte's a violinist. Maybe he was on the radio. I don't know what the hell he was. His old man came here and told us. His mitts are on his mind. You can't do a thing with a nut like that.

LORNA: Won't he give up the violin?

MOODY: You heard him stalling. This is the end, Lorna. It's our last chance for a decent life, for getting married—we have to make that kid fight! He's more than a meal ticket—he's everything we want and need from life!

[Lorna goes over and slaps him on the back] LORNA: Pick up your chin, little man.

MOODY: Don't Brisbane me, Lorna. I'm licked. I'm tired. Find me a mouse hole to crawl in. . . .

LORNA: Why don't you ask me when you want something? You got the brains of a flea. Do you want Bonaparte to fight?

MOODY: Do I wanna see tomorrow?

LORNA: I'll make him fight.

MOODY: How?

LORNA: How? . . . I'm "a tramp from Newark," Tom. . . . I know a dozen ways. . . .

SLOW FADEOUT

SCENE IV.

A few nights later. Joe and Lorna sit on a bench in the park. It is night. There is carousel music in the distance. Cars ride by in front of the boy and girl in the late spring night. Out of sight a traffic light changes from red to green and back again throughout the scene and casts its colors on the faces of the boy and girl.

LORNA: Success and fame! Or just a lousy living. You're lucky you won't have to worry about those things. . . .

JOE: Won't I?

LORNA: Unless Tom Moody's a liar. JOE: You like him, don't you? LORNA: [After a pause] I like him.

JOE: I like how you dress. The girls look nice in the summer time. Did you ever stand at the Fifth Avenue Library and watch those girls go by?

LORNA: No, I never did. [Switching the subject] That's the carousel, that music. Did you ever ride on one of those?

JOE: That's for kids.

LORNA: Weren't you ever a kid, for God's sake? JOE: Not a happy kid.

LORNA: Why?

JOE: Well, I always felt different. Even my name was special—Bonaparte—and my eyes . . .

LORNA: I wouldn't have taken that too serious....

[There is a silent pause. Joe looks straight ahead]

JOE: Gee, all those cars . . .

LORNA: Lots of horses trot around here. The rich know how to live. You'll be rich. . . .

JOE: My brother Frank is an organizer for the C.I.O.

LORNA: What's that?

JOE: If you worked in a factory you'd know. Did you ever work?

LORNA: [With a smile] No, when I came out of the cocoon I was a butterfly and butterflies don't work.

JOE: All those cars . . . whizz, whizz. [Now turning less casual] Where's Mr. Moody tonight?

LORNA: He goes up to see his kid on Tuesday nights. It's a sick kid, a girl. His wife leaves it at her mother's house.

JOE: That leaves you free, don't it? LORNA: What are you hinting at?

JOE: I'm thinking about you and Mr. Moody.

LORNA: Why think about it? I don't. Why should you?

JOE: If you belonged to me I wouldn't think about it.

LORNA: Haven't you got a girl?

JOE: No.

LORNA: Why not?

JOE: [Evasively] Oh . . .

LORNA: Tokio says you're going far in the fighting game.

JOE: Music means more to me. May I tell you something?

LORNA: Of course.

JOE: If you laugh I'll never speak to you again. LORNA: I'm not the laughing type.

JOE: With music I'm never alone when I'm atone— Playing music . . . that's like saying, "I am man. I belong here. How do you do, World—good evening!" When I play music nothing is closed to me. I'm not afraid of people and what they say. There's no war in music. It's not like the streets. Does, this sound funny?

LORNA: No.

JOE: But when you leave your room . . . down in the street . . . it's war! Music can't help me there. Understand?

LORNA: Yes.

JOE: People have hurt my feelings for years. I never forget. You can't get even with people by playing the fiddle. If music shot bullets I'd like it better—artists and people like that are freaks today. The world moves fast and they sit around like forgotten dopes.

LORNA: You're loaded with fireworks. Why don't you fight?

JOE: You have to be what you are—! LORNA: Fight! see what happens—
JOE: Or end up in the bughouse!

LORNA: God's teeth! Who says you have to be one thing?

JOE: My nature isn't fighting!

LORNA: Don't Tokio know what he's talking about? Don't Tom? Joe, listen: be a fighter! Show the world! If you made your fame and fortune—and you can—you'd be anything you want. Do it! Bang your way to the lightweight crown. Get a bank account. Hire a great doctor with a beard—get your eyes fixed—

JOE: What's the matter with my eyes?

LORNA: Excuse me, I stand corrected. [After a pause] You get mad all the time.

JOE: That's from thinking about myself.

LORNA: How old are you, Joe?

JOE: Twenty-one and a half, and the months are going fast.

LORNA: You're very smart for twenty-one and a half "and the months are going fast."

JOE: Why not? I read every page of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. My father's friend, Mr. Carp, has it. A shrimp with glasses had to do something.

LORNA: I'd like to meet your father. Your mother dead?

JOE: Yes.

LORNA: So is mine.

JOE: Where do you come from? The city is full of girls who look as if they never had parents.

LORNA: I'm a girl from over the river. My father is still alive—shucking oysters and bumming drinks somewhere in the wilds of Jersey. I'll tell you a secret: I don't like you.

JOE: [Surprised] Why?

LORNA: You're too sufficient by yourself . . . too inside yourself.

JOE: You like it or you don't. LORNA: You're on an island— JOE: Robinson Crusoe . . . LORNA: That's right—"me, myself, and I." Why not come out and see the world?

JOE: Does it seem that way? LORNA: Can't you see yourself?

JOE: No. . . .

LORNA: Take a bird's-eye view; you don't know what's right or wrong. You don't know what to pick, but you won't admit it.

JOE: Do you?

LORNA: Leave me out. This is the anatomy of Joe Bonaparte.

JOE: You're dancing on my nose, huh?

LORNA: Shall I stop?

JOE: No.

JORNA: You're a miserable creature. You want your arm in gelt up to the elbow. You'll take fame so people won't laugh or scorn your face. You'd give your soul for those things. But every time you turn your back your little soul kicks you in the teeth. It don't give in so easy.

JOE: And what does your soul do in its perfumed vanity case?

LORNA: Forget about me. JOE: Don't you want—?

LORNA: [Suddenly nasty] I told you to forget it!

JOE: [Quietly] Moody sent you after me—a decoy! You made a mistake, Lorna, for two reasons. I make up my own mind to fight. Point two, he doesn't know you don't love him—

LORNA: You're a fresh kid.

JOE: In fact he doesn't know anything about you at all.

LORNA: [Challengingly] But you do?

JOE: This is the anatomy of Lorna Moon: she's a lost baby. She doesn't know what's right or wrong. She's a miserable creature who never knew what to pick. But she'd never admit it. And I'll tell you why you picked Moody!

LORNA: You don't know what you're talking about.

JOE: Go home, Lorna. If you stay, I'll know something about you. . . .

LORNA: You don't know anything.

JOE: Now's your chance—go home!

LORNA: Tom loves me.

JOE: [After a long silence, looking ahead] I'm going to buy a car.

LORNA: They make wonderful cars today. Even the lizzies—

JOE: Gary Cooper's got the kind I want. I saw it in the paper, but it costs too much—fourteen thousand. If I found one second-hand—

LORNA: And if you had the cash-

JOE: I'll get it-

LORNA: Sure, if you'd go in and really fight!

JOE: [In a sudden burst] Tell your Mr. Moody I'll dazzle the eyes out of his head!

LORNA: You mean it?

JOE: [Looking out ahead] Those cars are poison in my blood. When you sit in a car and speed you're looking down at the world. Speed, speed, everything is speed—nobody gets me!

LORNA: You mean in the ring?

JOE: In or out, nobody gets me! Gee, I like to stroke that gas!

LORNA: You sound like Jack the Ripper.

JOE: [Standing up suddenly] I'll walk you back to your house—your hotel, I mean. [Lorna stands. Joe continues] Do you have the same room?

LORNA: [With sneaking admiration] You're a fresh kid!

JOE: When you're lying in his arms tonight, tell him, for me, that the next World's Champ is feeding ir, his stable.

LORNA: Did you really read those Britannia books?

JOE: From A to Z.

LORNA: And you're only twenty-one?

JOE: And a half.

LORNA: Something's wrong somewhere.

JOE: I know. . . .

[They slowly walk out as]

FADEOUT

SCENE V.

The next week. It is near midnight in the dining room of the Bonaparte home. An open suitcase rests on the table, Siggie is pouring samples of wine for Lorna Moon. He himself drinks appreciatively. To one side sits Mr. Bonaparte silently, thoughtfully, watchfully—pretending to read the newspaper.

SIGGIE: I was fit to be knocked down with a feather when I heard it. I couldn't believe it until I seen him fight over at the Keystone last week. You never know what somebody's got in him—like the man with germs—suddenly he's down in bed with a crisis!

[Joe enters with an armful of clothes which he begins to pack in the suitcase]

LORNA: Joe's road tour will do him lots of good.

[Anna enters and takes off an apron. Silence, in which Siggie and Lorna sip their wine]

ANNA: How do you like that wine, Miss Moon? My father makes better wine than any Eyetalian in New York. My father knows everything—don't you, poppa?

[With a faint smile, Mr. Bonaparte shrugs his shoulders]

SIGGIE: We're thinking of sending the old man to a leper colony. . . .

ANNA: Don't my husband say funny things? Tell her what you told the janitor Tuesday, Siggie.

SIGGIE: Never mind, never mind.

ANNA: You know how I met Siggie? He was a United Cigar Store clerk and I walked in for a pack of Camels and the first thing you know he said something funny. It was raw, so I can't say it. He had me laughing from the first. Seven years and I haven't stopped laughing yet. [She laughs loudly, pleasurably] This will be the first time Joe ever went traveling. Was you ever out of New York, Miss Moon?

LORNA: Oh, many times.

ANNA: That's nice. Far?

LORNA: California, Detroit, Chicago. I was an airplane hostess for two months.

ANNA: That's nice—it's a real adventure. I'd like to fly.

SIGGIE: Stay on the ground! Fly! What for? Who do you know up there? Eagles?

ANNA: It must be a wonderful way to see life.

LORNA: [Drinking] I've seen life in all its aspects. [Mr. Bonaparte stands up with a smile. Lorna's eyes follow him as he exits. To Joe] I think your father left because he don't like me.

JOE: He likes you.

ANNA: My father likes everybody. He's a very deep man. My father has more friends than any man alive. But best of all he likes his horse, Dolly, who drives the fruit wagon. My father can't sit still on Sunday afternoon—he has to go see what that horse is doing. [Her eyes catch sight of the suitcase] Joe, you don't know how to pack. [She starts over to assist him]

SIGGIE: [Querulously] Rest the feet awhile, Duchess.

ANNA: [Explaining her move] He don't know how to pack.

[Beginning to rearrange the suitcase. Mr. Bonaparte returns and hands Joe a sweater]

MR. BONAPARTE: You forget your good sweater.

JOE: Thanks. [Mr. Bonaparte sits. Joe looks at him sideways]

ANNA: When you get out to Chicago, buy yourself some new underwear, Joe. I hear everything's cheaper in Chicago. Is that right, Miss Moon?

LORNA: [After taking another drink] Chicago? I don't know. I was there only one night—I got news that night my mother died. As a matter of fact, she killed herself.

ANNA: That's very sad.

LORNA: No, my father's an old drunk son-of-a-bitch. Did you ask me about my father?

MR. BONAPARTE: [Who has been listening intently] Yes. . . .

LORNA: Twice a week he kicked my mother's face in. If I let myself go I'd be a drunkard in a year.

ANNA: My father never said one bad word to my mother in her whole lifetime. And she was a big nuisance right up till the day she died. She was more like me, more on the stout side. Take care of your health, Joe, when you're out there. What's better than health?

LORNA: [Turning to Mr. Bonaparte, with whom she is self-conscious] The question is, do you like me or do you not?

MR. BONAPARTE: [With a faint smile] Yes. . . . LORNA: Your family is very cute— Now do you like me?

MR. BONAPARTE: Yes. . . .

LORNA: Why do you look at me that way?

MR. BONAPARTE: I don't look special. You gonna travel on those train with my son?

LORNA: God's teeth, no! I'm a friend of his manager's, that's all. And a friend of Joe's, too.

MR. BONAPARTE: You are in favor for my son to prizefight?

[Joe looks at his father sideways and exits] LORNA: Certainly. Aren't you?

MR. BONAPARTE: Joe has a dream many year to be superior violin'. Was it boyhood thing? Was it real? Or is this real now? Those are-a my question, Miss Moon. Maybe you are friend to my son. Then I aska you, look out for him. Study him. Help him find what's a right. Tell me, Miss Moon, when you find out. Help Joe find truthful success. Will you do it for me?

LORNA: I'll be glad to keep my eye on him.

[Joe enters with slippers, which he puts in bag] ANNA: [To Joe] You could stand some new shirts, too.

SIGGIE: Listen, pop, I'm a natural man and I don't like wise guys. Joe went in the boxing game 'cause he's ashamed to be poor. That's his way to enter a little enterprise. All other remarks are so much alfalfa!

[Joe locks the bag]

ANNA: [Taking the wine glass from Siggie's hand] Drunk as a horse fly!

JOE: It's getting late and the train won't wait.

siggie: [Standing up] My god is success. Need I say more? I'm prouda you, Joe. Come home a champ. Make enough dough to buy your sister's boy friend a new cab. Yes, boys and girls, I'm looking in that old crystal ball and I see strange and wonderful events! Yazoo!

ANNA: [Giggling] Drunk as a horse fly!

JOE: [To Siggie] You can't drive us down to the station in this condition.

SIGGIE: What condition? ANNA: You're drunk, stupid.

SIGGIE: Shut the face, foolish! Just because I don't hold in my nerves she thinks I'm drunk. If you hold in your nerves you get ulcers. [To Joe] Get your "chapow" and let's go. Or don't you want me to drive you down?

JOE: No.

SIGGIE: I should worry—my cab's in the garage anyway! [Suddenly he sits]

JOE: We'd better start. . . .

LORNA: [To Mr. Bonaparte] I'd like to have another talk with you some time.

MR. BONAPARTE: Come any time in the evening. You are a very lovely girl. [Mr. Carp stands in the doorway] Here is Mr. Carp to say good-bye.

SIGGIE: Come in, my little prince.

CARP: [Coming in and shaking hands with Joe] I wish you good luck in every undertaking.

JOE: [Uneasily, because his father is looking at him] Thanks.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Introducing Carp] Miss Moon, my neighbor, Mr. Carp.

CARP: A pleasure to meet you.

LORNA: Hello.

[Mr. Bonaparte brings the violin case from its hiding place in the buffet]

MR. BONAPARTE: Joe, I buy you this some time ago. Don't give cause I don't know whatta you gonna do. Take him with you now. Play for yourself. It gonna remember you your old days of musical life.

[Joe puts down the suitcase and picks up the violin. He plucks the strings, he tightens one of them. In spite of the tension his face turns soft and tender]

LORNA: [Watching intently] We better not miss the train—Tokio's waiting.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Of violin] Take him with you, Joe.

JOE: It's beautiful. . . .

MR. BONAPARTE: Practise on the road.

[Joe abruptly turns and with the violin exits. The others listen, each standing in his place, as rich violin music comes from the other room. Joe returns. There is silence as he places the violin on the table in front of his father]

JOE: [In a low voice] Return it, poppa.

ANNA: [Hugging Joe] Have a good trip, Joey.

CARP: Eat in good restaurants. . .

[There is silence: the Father and Son look at each other. The others in the room sense the drama between the two. Finally]

JOE: I have to do this, poppa.

MR. BONAPARTE: [To Joe] Be careful for your hands.

JOE: Poppa, give me the word—MR. BONAPARTE: What word?

JOE: Give me the word to go ahead. You're looking at yesterday—I see tomorrow. Maybe you think I ought to spend my whole life here—you and Carp blowing off steam.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Holding himself back] Oh, Joe, shut your mouth!

JOE: Give me the word to go ahead!

MR. BONAPARTE: Be careful for your hands!

JOE: I want you to give me the word!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Crying out] No! No word! You gonna fight? All right! Okay! But I don't gonna give no word! No!

JOE: That's how you feel?

MR. BONAPARTE: That's a how I feel! [Mr. Bonaparte's voice breaks and there is nothing for father and son to do but to clutch each other in a hasty embrace. Finally Mr. Bonaparte disentangles himself and turns away. Joe abruptly grabs up his suitcase and exits. Lorna follows, stopping at the door to look back at Mr. Bonaparte. In the ensuing silence Anna looks at her father and shakes her head. Siggie suddenly lumbers to his feet and sounds off like a chime

SIGGIE: Gong gong gong!

ANNA: Gee, poppa . . .

SIGGIE: Come to bed, Anna.... Anna-banana... [Siggie exits]

ANNA: Gee, poppa . . . [She touches her father sympathetically]

MR. BONAPARTE: [Without turning] Gone to bed, Anna. . . .

[Anna slowly exits. Mr. Bonaparte now slowly comes back to the table and looks down at the violin]

CARP: [Seating him slowly] Come, my friend . . . we will have a nice talk on a cultural topic. [Looking at the violin] You'll work around a number of years before you make it up, the price of that fiddle. . . .

[Mr. Bonaparte stands looking down at the violin]

CARP: [Sadly] Yes, my friend, what is man? As Schopenhauer says, and in the last analysis . . .

SLOW FADEOUT

ACT II. SCENE I.

Six months later. Present in the corner of a gymnasium are Roxy, Moody, Lorna and Tokio. They are looking off right, watching Joe Bonaparte work out with a partner. From off right come the sounds of typical gym activities: the thud of boxing gloves, the rat-a-tat of the punching bag, and from time to time the general bell which is a signal for rest periods. Tacked on the tin walls are an ad for Everlast boxing equipment, boxing "card" placards, a soiled American flag, some faded exit signs. The group watches silently for several seconds after the lights fade in. A Boxer, wiping his perspiring body with a towel, passes from left to right and looks back at Lorna's legs. As Roxy watches, his head moves to and fro in the rhythm of Joe's sparring off stage, Roxy nods his head in admiration.

ROXY: Tokio. I gotta give the devil his dues: in the past six months you done a noble job!

TOKIO: [Calling off] With the left! A long left,

LORNA: [Looking off] Joe's a very good-looking boy. I never quite noticed it before.

[The general bell sounds; the boxing din off stage stops]

MOODY: [Rubbing his hands enthusiastically] "Let it rain, let it pour! It ain't gonna rain where we're headed for!"

ROXY: I'm tickled to death to see the canary birds left his gloves.

токю: He's the king of all he surveys.

MOODY: Boy, oh, boy, how he surprised them in the Bronx last night! . . . But one thing I can't explain—that knockout he took in Philly five weeks ago.

TOKIO: That night he was off his feed, Tom. Where do you see speed like that? That's style, real style—you can't tag him. And he's giving it with both hands.

MOODY: You don't have to sell me his virtues—I'm sold. Nevertheless, he got tagged in Philly.

TOKIO: Here's what happened there: we run into some man when we're leaving the hotel. Joe goes pale. I ask him what it is. "Nothing," he says. But I see for myself—a man with long hair and a violin case. When we turn the corner, he says, "He's after me," he says. As if it's cops and robbers!

[The general bell sounds; the fighting din begins again]

ROXY: A kidnapper?

LORNA: Don't be a fool. He was reminded . . . ROXY: Speak when spoken to, Miss Moon!

MOODY: [Moodily] And when he got in the ring that night, he kept his hands in his pockets?

TOKIO: Yeah. I didn't mention this before—it's not important.

MOODY: But it's still a danger-

TOKIO: No. No.

MOODY: But anyway, we better get him away from his home. We can't afford no more possible bad showings at this stage of the game. No more apparitions, like suddenly a fiddle flies across the room on wings!

[The group again intently watches Joe off stage] MOODY: Ooh! Did you see that? He's packing a real Sunday punch in that right. [Calling off] Hit 'im, Joe, hit 'im! [As an indistinct answer come back] Ha ha, looka that, hahaha . . . [Now turning to Tokio] What's your idea of a match with Lombardo?

токіо: Can you get it?

моору: Maybe. токіо: Get it. моору: Sure?

TOKIO: It's an easy win, on points at least.

[During the last few lines a thin dark man has entered. His dark hair is grayed at the temples, an inarticulate look in his face. He is Eddie Fuseli, a renowned gambler and gunman]

EDDIE FUSELI: [Approaching the group] Hello.

ROXY: [Nervously] Hello, Eddie.

MOODY: [Turning] I haven't seen you for a dog's age, Fuseli.

EDDIE: [Pointing off left] You got this certain boy—Bonaparte. I like his looks. American born?

ROXY: Right from here.

EDDIE: [Watching Joe off] Like a cat, never off his position. He appeals to me. [To Moody] They call you the Brown Fox. What's your opinion of this boy?

MOODY: [Coolly, on guard] Possibilities. . . .

EDDIE: [To Tokio] What's your idea?

токю: Tom said it.

EDDIE: Could he get on top?

MOODY: [As above] I can't see that far ahead. I don't read palms.

EDDIE: Could I buy a piece?

MOODY: No.

EDDIE: [Coolly] Could I?

MOODY: No!

EDDIE: [With a certain tenderness] I like a good fighter. I like to see you after, Tom. [Of Lorna] This your girl?

LORNA: [Pertly] I'm my mother's girl.

EDDIE: [With a small mirthless laugh] Ha ha—that's a hot one. [He coolly drifts out of the scene on his cat's feet. The general bell sounds. The din ceases]

LORNA: What exhaust pipe did he crawl out of?

ROXY: I remember this Eddie Fuseli when he came back from the war with a gun. He's still got the gun and he still gives me goose pimples!

MOODY: That Fuseli's a black mark on my book. Every once in a while he shoots across my quiet existence like a roman candle!

LORNA: Sell or don't sell. But better be careful, that guy's tough.

[A Fighter, robed, hooded with towel, passes across: A Gambling Type passes in the opposite direction. Both look at Lorna's legs]

MOODY: Give a rat like that a finger and you lose a hand before you know it!

токіо: Did you know Joe bought a car this morning?

ROXY: What kinda car? TOKIO: A Duesenberg.

MOODY: One of those fancy speed wagons?

токю: [Agreeing] It cost him five grand, second-hand.

MOODY: [Flaring up] Am I a step-child around here? I'm glad you tell me now, if only outa courtesy!

ROXY: [Indignantly] Whatta you keep a thing like that incognito for?

MOODY: He drives like a maniac! That time we drove to Long Beach? I almost lost my scalp! We can't let him drive around like that! Boy, he's getting a bushel of bad habits! We gotta be careful.

[The general bell sounds again; the fighting din stops]

MOODY: Here's the truth: our boy can be the champ in three easy lessons—Lombardo, Fulton, the Chocolate Drop. But we gotta be careful!

LORNA: Here he comes. [Joe enters in bathrobe, taking off his headgear, which Tokio takes from him]

MOODY: [Completely changing his tone] You looked very good in there, Joe. You're going swell and I like it. I'd work more with that long left if I were you.

JOE: Yes, I was speaking to Tokio about that. I feel my form's improving. I like to work. I'm getting somewhere—I feel it better every day.

LORNA: Happy?

JOE: [Looking at her intently] Every day's Saturday!

ROXY: [Officiously] Say, what's this I hear you bought a Duesenberg?

JOE: What's your objection—I might have some fun?

ROXY: I got my wampum on you. I like to know your habits. Ain't I permitted?

[Joe is about to retort hotly when Moody gently takes his arm in an attempt to soothe him]

MOODY: Wait a minute, Joe. After all we have your welfare at heart. And after all a Duesenberg can go one fifty per—

[Eddie Fuseli appears above, unseen by the others. He listens]

JOE: Who'd want to drive that fast?

MOODY: And since we're vitally interested in your future—

Joe: [Shaking off Moody's arm and saying what is really on his mind] If you're vitally interested in my future, prove it! Get me some fights—fights with contenders, not with dumb-bunny club fighters. Get me some main bouts in the metropolitan area!—

MOODY: [Losing his temper] For a kid who got kayoed five weeks ago, your mouth is pretty big! [The general bell sounds; the din begins]

JOE: That won't happen again! And how about some mention in the press? Twenty-six bouts—no one knows I'm alive. This isn't vacation for me—it's a profession! I'm staying more than a week. Match me up against real talent. You can't go too fast for me. Don't worry about autos!

MOODY: We can go too fast! You're not so good!

JOE: [With a boyish grin] Look at the records!
[Joe abruptly exits. Tokio follows him, first giving the others a glance]

MOODY: Boy, oh, boy, that kid's changing!

ROXY: He goes past my head like a cold wind from the river!

LORNA: But you're gettin' what you want—the contender for the crown!

MOODY: I wish I was sure.

ROXY: Frankenstein! [Eddie Fuseli saunters down to the others]

EDDIE: I thought it over, Tom. I like to get a piece of that boy.

MOODY: [Angrily] I thought it over, too—not for sale. In fact I had a visitation from Jehovah. He came down on the calm waters and He said, "Let there be unity in the ownership."

EDDIE: [With a dead face] I had a visit, too. He came down in the bar and He ate a pretzel. And He says, "Eddie Fuseli, I like you to buy a piece!"

MOODY: [Trying to delay the inevitable] Why not see me in my office tomorrow?

EDDIE: It's a cheap office. I get depressed in that office.

MOODY: [Finally] I can't make any guarantees about the boy.

EDDIE: How do you mean it, Tom?

MOODY: I don't know what the hell he'll do in the ROXY: Eddie, it's like flap-jacks—up and down—vou don't know which side next!

EDDIE: [With his small mirthless laugh] Ha ha, that's a good one. You oughta be on the radio.

MOODY: No, it's a fact-

ROXY: We had enough headaches already. He's got a father, but how!

EDDIE: Don't want him to fight?

ROXY: His father sits on the kid's head like a bird's nest! [Roxy puts his hand on Eddie's arm]

EDDIE: Take your hand off. [Roxy hastily with-draws] Let the boy decide. . . .

MOODY: If you buy in? EDDIE: Let the boy decide.

MOODY: Sure! But if he says no— [Before Moody can finish Joe enters. Eddie whirls around and faces Joe, getting his cue from the others. Curiously, Eddie is almost embarrassed before Joe. The bell sounds; the din stops]

MOODY: Joe, this is Eddie Fuseli. He's a man around town—

EDDIE: [Facing Joe, his back to the others] With good connections—

MOODY: He wantsa buy a piece of you-

EDDIE: [Whirling around] I will tell him myself. [Turning back to Joe; with quiet intense dignity] I'm Eyetalian too—Eyetalian born, but an American citizen. I like to buy a piece of you. I don't care for no profit. I could turn it back to—you could take my share. But I like a good fighter; I like a good boy who could win the crown. It's the inter-est of my life. It would be a proud thing for me when Bonaparte could win the crown like I think he can.

MOODY: [Confidently] It's up to you, Joe, if he buys in.

EDDIE: [Wooingly] Some managers can't give you what you need—

MOODY: Don't say that!

EDDIE: Some managers can't! I'll see you get good bouts . . . also press notices . . . I know how. You're a boy who needs that. You decide . . .

[There is a pause; Joe's eyes flit from Lorna to the others and back to Eddie]

JOE: Not my half. EDDIE: Not your half.

JOE: As long as Mr. Fuseli doesn't mix in my private life . . . cut it up any way you like. Excuse me, I got a date with Miss Duesenberg. [The others silently watch Joe exit]

EDDIE: A date with who?

MOODY: [Snorting] Miss Duesenberg!

ROXY: An automobile. It gives you an idea what a boy—"Miss Duesenberg"!

EDDIE: How do you like it, Tom? Big bills or little bills?

MOODY: Don't think you're buying in for an apple and an egg.

EDDIE: Take big bills—they're new, they feel good. See you in that office tomorrow.

[The bell clangs off stage. Eddie starts off, but abruptly turns and faces Roxy whom he inwardly terrifies]

EDDIE: It's a trick you don't know, Roxy: when a bird sits on your head and interferes with the championship, you shoot him off. All kinds of birds. You be surprised how fast they fall on the ground. Which is my intention in this syndicate. [He smiles thinly and then moves out of the scene like a cat]

MOODY: I don't like that!

ROXY: I'm not so happy myself at the present time. How do you like it with our boy for gratitude? He leaves us here standing in our brevities!

LORNA: What makes you think you're worthy of gratitude?

MOODY: [To Lorna] For Pete's sake, pipe down! Are you with us or against us?

ROXY: [Haughtily, to Moody] Take my advice, Tom. Marry her and the first year give her a baby. Then she'll sit in the corner and get fat and sleepy, and not have such a big mouth! Uncle Roxy's telling you!

LORNA: [To Roxy] Couldn't you keep quiet about the father to that gunman? Go home and let your wife give you a baby!

ROXY: A woman shouldn't interfere-

MOODY: Peace, for chri' sake, peace! Lorna, we're in a bad spot with Joe. He's getting hard to manage and this is the time when everything's gotta be right. I'm seeing Lombardo's manager tomorrow! Now that gunman's on my tail. You have to help me. You and I wanna do it like the story books, "happy ever after"? Then help me.

LORNA: How?

MOODY: Go after the boy. Keep him away from his folks. Get him away from the buggies—

LORNA: How?

MOODY: [Impatiently] You know how.

ROXY: Now you're talking.

LORNA: [Pointing to Roxy] You mean the way I see it on his face?

MOODY: For crying out loud! Where do you come off to make a remark like that?

LORNA: You expect me to sleep with that boy?

MOODY: I could tear your ears off for a remark like that!

ROXY: [Discreetly] I think I'll go grab a cornbeef sandwich. [He exits]

MOODY: [After silence] Are you mad?

LORNA: [Tight-lipped] No.

MOODY: [Seductively] I'm not a bad guy, Lorna. I don't mean anything bad. . . . All right, I'm crude-sometimes I'm worried and I'm crude. [The bell clangs; the boxing din stops] But what the hell, my heart's in the right place. . . . [Coming behind her and putting his arms around her as she looks ahead] Lorna, don't we both want that sun to come up and shine on us? Don't we? Before you know it the summer'll be here. Then it's the winter again, and it's another year again . . . and we're not married yet. See? . . . See what I mean? . . .

LORNA: [Quietly] Yes. . . .

MOODY: [Beaming, but with uncertainty] That sounds like the girl I used to know.

LORNA: I see what you mean. . .

MOODY: [Worried underneath] You're not still

LORNA: [Briefly] I'm not mad. [But she abruptly cuts out of the scene, leaving Moody standing therel MOODY: [Shaking his head] Boy, I still don't know anything about women! . . .

MEDIUM FADEOUT

SCENE II.

A few nights later. Lorna and Joe sit on the same park bench.

JOE: Some nights I wake up-my heart's beating a mile a minute! Before I open my eyes I know what it is—the feeling that someone's standing at my bed. Then I open my eyes . . . it's gone—ran away!

LORNA: Maybe it's that old fiddle of yours.

JOE: Lorna, maybe it's you. . .

LORNA: Don't you ever think of it any moremusic?

JOE: What're you trying to remind me of? A kid with a Buster Brown collar and a violin case tucked under his arm? Does that sound appetizing to you?

LORNA: Not when you say it that way. You said it different once. . . .

JOE: What's on your mind, Lorna?

LORNA: What's on yours?

JOE: [Simply] You. . . . You're real for methe way music was real.

LORNA: You've got your car, your career-what do you want with me?

JOE: I develop the ability to knock down anyone my weight. But what point have I made? Don't you think I know that? I went off to the wars 'cause someone called me a name-because I wanted to be two other guys. Now it's happening. . . . I'm not sure I like it.

LORNA: Moody's against that car of yours. JOE: I'm against Moody, so we're even.

LORNA: Why don't you like him?

JOE: He's a manager! He treats me like a possession! I'm just a little silver mine for him-he bangs me around with a shovel!

LORNA: He's helped you-

JOE: No, Tokio's helped me. Why don't you give him up? It's terrible to have just a Tuesday-night girl. Why don't you belong to me every night in the week? Why don't you teach me love? . . . Or am I being a fool?

LORNA: You're not a fool, Joe.

JOE: I want you to be my family, my life—Why don't you do it, Lorna, why?

LORNA: He loves me.

JOE: I love you!

LORNA: [Treading delicately] Well . . . Anyway, the early bird got the worm. Anyway, I can't give him anguish. I... I know what it's like. You shouldn't kick Moody around. He's poor compared to you. You're alive, you've got yourself-I can't feel sorry for you!

JOE: But you don't love him!

LORNA: I'm not much interested in myself. But the thing I like best about you . . . you still feel like a flop. It's mysterious, Joe. It makes me put my hand out. [She gives him her hand and he grasps it]

JOE: I feel very close to you, Lorna.

LORNA: I know. . . .

JOE: And you feel close to me. But you're afraid-

LORNA: Of what?

JOE: To take a chance! Lorna darling, you won't let me wake you up! I feel it all the time-you're half dead, and you don't know it!

LORNA: [Half smiling] Maybe I do. . . . JOE: Don't smile—don't be hard-boiled!

LORNA: [Sincerely] I'm not. JOE: Don't you trust me?

LORNA: [Evasively] Why start what we can't finish? JOE: [Fiercely] Oh, Lorna, deep as my voice will reach—listen!! Why can't you leave him? Why?

LORNA: Don't pull my dress off—I hear you. JOE: Why?

LORNA: Because he needs me and you don't-JOE: That's not true!

LORNA: Because he's a desperate guy who always starts out with two strikes against him. Because he's a kid at forty-two and you're a man at twenty-two.

JOE: You're sorry for him?

LORNA: What's wrong with that?

JOE: But what do you get?

LORNA: I told you before I don't care.

JOE: I don't believe it!

LORNA: I can't help that! JOE: What did he ever do for you?

LORNA: [With sudden verve] Would you like to know? He loved me in a world of enemies, of stags and bulls! . . . and I loved him for that. He picked me up in Friskin's hotel on 39th Street. I was nine weeks behind in rent. I hadn't hit the gutter yet, but I was near. He washed my face and combed my hair. He stiffened the space between my shoulder blades. Misery reached out to misery-

JOE: And now you're dead.

LORNA: [Lashing out] I don't know what the hell you're talking about!

JOE: Yes, you do. . . .

LORNA: [Withdrawing] Ho hum. . . .

[There is silence. The soft park music plays in the distance. The traffic lights change. Lorna is trying to appear impassive. Joe begins to whistle softly. Finally Lorna picks up his last note and continues; he stops. He picks up her note, and after he whistles a few phrases she picks him up again. This whistling duet continues for almost a minute. Then the traffic lights change again]

LORNA: [Beginning in a low voice] You make me feel too human, Joe. All I want is peace and quiet, not love. I'm a tired old lady, Joe, and I don't mind being what you call "half dead." In fact it's what I like. [Her voice mounting higher] The twice I was in love I took an awful beating and I don't want it again. [Now half crying] I want you to stop it! Don't devil me, Joe. I beg you, don't devil me . . . let me alone. . . . [She cries softly. Joe reaches out and takes her hand; he gives her a handkerchief which she uses]

LORNA: [Finally] That's the third time I cried in

JOE: Now I know you love me.

LORNA: [Bitterly] Well . . .

JOE: I'll tell Moody.

LORNA: Not yet. Maybe he'd kill you if he knew.

JOE: Maybe.

LORNA: Then Fuseli'd kill him. . . . I guess I'd be left to kill myself. I'll tell him....

JOE: When?

LORNA: Not tonight.

JOE: Swiftly, do it swiftly-

LORNA: Not tonight.

JOE: Everything's easy if you do it swiftly.

LORNA: He went up there tonight with six hundred bucks to bribe her into divorce.

JOE: Oh . . .

LORNA: [Sadly] He's a good guy, neat all oversweet. I'll tell him tomorrow. I'd like a drink.

JOE: Let's drive over the Washington Bridge.

LORNA: [Standing] No, I'd like a drink.

JOE: [Standing and facing her] Lorna, when I talk to you . . . something moves in my heart. Gee, it's the beginning of a wonderful life! A man and his girl! A warm living girl who shares your room. . . .

LORNA: Take me home with you.

JOE: Yes.

LORNA: But how do I know you love me?

JOE: Lorna . . .

LORNA: How do I know it's true? You'll get to be the champ. They'll all want you, all the girls! But I don't care! I've been undersea a long time! When they'd put their hands on me I used to say, "This isn't it! This isn't what I mean!" It's been a mysterious world for me! But, Joe, I think you're it! I don't know why, I think you're it! Take me home with you.

JOE: Lorna!

LORNA: Poor Tom . . .

JOE: Poor Lorna! [The rest is embrace and kiss and clutching each other]

SLOW FADEOUT

SCENE III.

The next day: the office. Lorna and Moody are present. She has a hangover and is restless.

MOODY: Boy, you certainly double-scotched last night. What's the idea, you making a career of drinking in your old age? Headache?

LORNA: No.

MOODY: I won't let you walk alone in the park any more, if you do that.

LORNA: [Nasty in spite of her best intentions] Well, if you stayed away from your wife for a change . .

MOODY: It's pretty late to bring that up, isn't it? Tuesday nights-

LORNA: I can't help it-I feel like a tramp. I've felt like a tramp for years.

MOODY: She was pretty friendly last night.

LORNA: Yeah? Did you sleep with her?

MOODY: What the hell's the matter with you. Lorna? [He goes to her. She shrugs away from him] LORNA: Keep off the grass! [Moody gives her a quizzical look, goes back to his desk and from there gives her another quizzical look]

MOODY: Why do you drink like that?

LORNA: [Pointing to her chest] Right here there's a hard lump and I drink to dissolve it. Do you mind?

MOODY: I don't mind-as long as you keep your health.

LORNA: Aw, Christ!--you and your health talks! MOODY: You're looking for a fight, dolly-girl!

LORNA: And you'll give it?

MOODY: [With a grin] No, I'm feeling too good. LORNA: [Sitting wearily] Who left you a fortune? MOODY: Better. Monica's seen the light. The truth is she's begun to run around with a retired brewer and now she wants the divorce.

LORNA: Good, now she can begin paying you. MOODY: She goes to Reno in a few months. LORNA: [Moodily] I feel like a tramp. . . .

MOODY: That's what I'm telling you— In a few months we'll be married! [He laughs with pleasure] LORNA: You still want to marry me? Don't I feel like an old shoe to you?

MOODY: [Coming to her] Honest, you're so dumb! LORNA: [Touched by his boyishness] You're so sweet. . . .

MOODY: And flash!—I signed Lombardo today! They meet six weeks from tonight.

LORNA: Goody. . . .

MOODY: [Disappointed by her flippant reaction, but continuing] I'm still not sure what he'll show with Lombardo. But my present worry is this: help me get that kid straight. Did you speak to him about the driving last night?

LORNA: I didn't see him. . . .

MOODY: It's very important. A Lombardo win clinches everything. In the fall we ride up to the Chocolate's door and dump him in the gutter! After that . . . I don't like to exaggerate—but the kid's primed! And you and I—Lorna baby, we're set. [Happily] What do you think of that?

LORNA: [Evasively] You draw beautiful pictures.

[A knock sounds on the door]

MOODY: Come in. [Siggie enters, dressed in cab driver's garb]

SIGGIE: Hello, Miss Moon.

LORNA: Helio. You know Mr. Moody.

SIGGIE: [To Moody] Hello.

MOODY: What can we do for you?

SIGGIE: For me you can't do nothing. I'm sore. I'm here against my better instinct. [Taking a roll of money from his pocket and slapping it on the desk] He don't want it—no part of it! My father-in-law don't want it. Joe sent it up—two hundred bucks—enough to choke a horse—but he don't want it!

MOODY: Why?

LORNA: That's nice he remembers his folks.

SIGGIE: Listen, I got a father-in-law nothing's nice to him but feeding his horse and giving a laugh and slicing philosophical salami across the table! He's sore because Joe don't come home half the time. As a matter of fact, ain't he suppose to come to sleep no more? The old man's worried.

MOODY: That's not my concern.

SIGGIE: I can't see what it's such a worry. A boy gets in the higher brackets—what's the worry. He's got enough clothes now to leave three suits home in the closet. [Turning to Lorna] It won't hurt if he sends me a few passes—tell him I said so.

LORNA: How's the wife?

SIGGIE: The Duchess? Still laughing. LORNA: When you getting that cab?

SIGGIE: Do me a favor, Miss Moon—tell him I could use this wad for the first instalment.

LORNA: I'll tell him. Tell Mr. Bonaparte I saw Joe last night. He's fine.

MOODY: I'll see you get some passes.

SIGGIE: Thanks, thanks to both of you. Adios. [He exits]

LORNA: He and his wife are crazy for each other. Married . . . they throw each other around, but they're like love birds. Marriage is something special. . . . I guess you have to deserve it.

MOODY: I thought you didn't see Joe last night.

LORNA: I didn't, but why worry his father?

MOODY: The hell with his father.

LORNA: The hell with you!

MOODY: [After a brooding pause] I'll tell you something, Lorna. I'm not overjoyed the way Joe looks at you.

LORNA: How's he look?

MOODY: As if he saw the whole island of Manhattan in your face, and I don't like it.

LORNA: You thought of that too late.

MOODY: Too late for what? LORNA: To bawl me out.

MOODY: Who's bawling you out?

LORNA: You were about to. Or warn me. I don't need warnings. [Coasting away from the argument] If you saw Joe's father you'd like him.

MOODY: I saw him.

LORNA: If you knew him you'd like him.

MOODY: Who wantsa like him? What do I need him for? I don't like him and I don't like his son! It's a business—Joe does his work, I do mine. Like this telephone—I pay the bill and I use it!

LORNA: He's human....

MOODY: What're we fighting about?

LORNA: We're fighting about love. I'm trying to tell you how cynical I am. Tell the truth, love doesn't last—

MOODY: [Suddenly quietly serious] Everything I said about Joe—the opposite goes for you. Love lasts . . . if you want it to . . . I want it to last. I need it to last. What the hell's all this struggle to make a living for if not for a woman and a home? I don't kid myself. I know what I need. I need you, Lorna.

LORNA: It has to end. . . . MOODY: What has to end?

LORNA: Everything.

MOODY: What're you talking about?

LORNA: I oughta burn. I'm leaving you. . . . MOODY: [With a sick smile] That's what you think.

LORNA: [Not looking at him] I mean it.

MOODY: [As above] I mean it too.

LORNA: [After looking at him for a moment] You can't take a joke?

MOODY: [Not knowing where he stands] It all depends. . . . I don't like a joke that pushes the blood down in my feet.

LORNA: [Coming to him and putting her arms around his neck] That's true, you're pale.

MOODY: Who's the man?

LORNA: [Heartsick, and unable to tell him the truth] There's no man, Tom . . . even if there was, I couldn't leave you. [She looks at him, unable to say more]

MOODY: [After a pause] How about some lunch? I'll buy it. . . .

LORNA: [Wearily] Where would I put it, Tom?
MOODY: [Impulsively] In your hat! [And suddenly he ambraces her roughly and kisses her fully and she allows it. Joe walks into the office, Eddie Fuseli behind him. They break apart]

JOE: The first time I walked in here that was going on. It's one long duet around here.

MOODY: Hello.

EDDIE: [Sardonically] Hello, Partner. . . . [Lorna is silent and avoids Joe's looks] Joe: How about that fight with Lombardo?

MOODY: Six weeks from tonight. JOE: He's gonna be surprised. MOODY: [Coolly] No one doubts it.

JOE: [Sharply] I didn't say it was doubted!

Moody: Boy, everyone's off his feed today. It started with the elevator boy—next it's Lorna—now it's you! What are you sore about?

LORNA: [Trying to turn the conversation; to Joe] Siggie was here looking for you. Your father's worried—

JOE: Not as much as my "manager" worries me. MOODY: I don't need you to tell me how to run my business. I'll book the matches—

JOE: That doesn't worry me.

MOODY: But you and your speeding worries me! First it's music, then it's motors. Christ, next it'll be girls and booze!

JOE: It's girls already.

LORNA: Joe-

JOE: [Bitterly] Certainly! By the dozens!

EDDIE: Haha—that's a hot one. Don't ask me which is worst—women or spiders.

LORNA: Siggie left this money—your father won't take it. Siggie says buy him a cab—

[Joe takes the money]

EDDIE: Your relative? I'll get him a cab. [To Moody] How about a flock of bouts for Bonaparte over the summer?

MOODY: [Bitterly] All he wants—practice fights—to make him a better "artiste."

EDDIE: That is what we like. [Joe is looking at Lorna]

MOODY: "We?" Where do I come in?

EDDIE: You push the buttons, the right buttons. I wanna see Bonaparte with the crown.

MOODY: [Sarcastically] Your concern touches me deep in my heart!

EDDIE: What's the matter, Tom? You getting tired?

MOODY: [Coolly] I get tired, don't you?

EDDIE: Don't get tired, Tom . . . not in a crucial time.

MOODY: Get him to give up that Duesenberg. EDDIE: [After looking at Joe] That's his fun. . . .

MOODY: His fun might cost your crown.

JOE: [Suddenly to Lorna] Why did you kiss him?

MOODY: [To Joe] It's about time you shut your mouth and minded your own goddam business. Also, that you took some orders.

JOE: [Suddenly savage] Who are you, God?

MOODY: Yes! I'm your maker, you cock-eyed gutter rat! Outa sawdust and spit I made you! I own you—without me you're a blank! Your insolence is gorgeous, but this is the end! I'm a son of a gun! What're you so superior about?

EDDIE: Don't talk so quick, Tom. You don't know . . .

MOODY: I wouldn't take the crap of this last six eight months from the President himself! Cut me up in little pieces, baby—but not me!

EDDIE: [Quietly] You could get cut up in little pieces.

MOODY: [Retiring in disgust] Sisst!

EDDIE: You hear me?

MOODY: [From his desk] You wanna manage this boy? Help yourself—do it! I'll sell my piece for half of what it's worth. You wanna buy?

EDDIE: You are a funny man.

MOODY: Gimme twenty thousand and lemme out. Ten, I'll take ten. I got my girl. I don't need crowns or jewels. I take my girl and we go sit by the river and it's everything.

JOE: What girl?

MOODY: I'm not on speaking terms with you! [To Eddie] Well?

EDDIE: It would be funny if your arms got broke.

JOE: Wait a minute! Lorna loves me and I love her.

MOODY: [After looking from Joe to Lorna and back] Crazy as a bat! [He laughs]

JOE: [Frigidly] Is it so impossible?

MOODY: About as possible as hell freezes over. [He and Joe simultaneously turn to Lorna]

JOE: Tell him. . . .

LORNA: [Looking Joe in the face] I love Tom. Tell him what?

[Joe looks at her intently. Silence. Joe then turns and quietly exits from the office. Moody shakes his head with a grin]

MOODY: Eddie, I take everything back. I was a fool to get sore—that boy's a real nutsy-Fagan! [He offers his hand. Eddie looks at it and then viciously slaps it down]

EDDIE: [Repressing a trembling voice] I don't like no one to laugh at that boy. You call a boy like that a rat? An educated boy? What is your idea to call him cock-eyed? When you do it in front of me, I say, "Tom don't like himself" . . . for Bonaparte is a good friend to me . . . you're a clever manager for him. That's the only reason I take your slop. Do your business, Tom. [To Lorna] And that goes for you, too! No tricks, Miss Moon! [He slowly exits. Moody stands there thoughtfully. Lorna moves to the couch]

MOODY: I'm a son of a gun!

LORNA: I feel like I'm shot from a cannon.

MOODY: Why?

LORNA: I'm sorry for him.

MOODY: Why? Because he's a queer?

LORNA: I'm not talking of Fuseli. [Suddenly Lorna's eyes flood with tears. Moody takes her hand, half sensing the truth]

MOODY: What's wrong, Lorna? You can tell me. . . .

LORNA: I feel like the wrath of God. MOODY: You like that boy, don't you?

LORNA: I love him, Tom.
SLOW FADEOUT

SCENE IV.

Six weeks later. A dressing room before the Lombardo fight. There are a couple of rubbing tables in the room. There are some lockers and a few hooks on which hang pieces of clothing. A door to the left leads to the showers; a door to the right leads to the arena. As the lights fade in, Mr. Bonaparte and Siggie are sitting to one side, on a long wooden bench. Tokio is fussing around in a locker. A fighter, Pepper White, hands already bandaged, is being rubbed down by his trainer-manager, Mickey. Throughout the scene is heard the distant Roar of The Crowd and the clanging of the bell.

MR. BONAPARTE: [After a silence of intense listening] What is that noise?

SIGGIE: That's the roar of the crowd.
MR. BONAPARTE: A thousand people?

SIGGIE: Six thousand.

PEPPER WHITE: [Turning his head as he lies on his belly] Nine thousand.

SIGGIE: That's right, nine. You're sitting under nine thousand people. Suppose they fell down on your head? Did you ever think of that?

[The outside door opens; Eddie Fuseli enters. The distant bell clangs. Eddie looks around suspiciously, then asks Tokio]

EDDIE: Where's Bonaparte?

TOKIO: Still with the newspapermen.

EDDIE: [Unpleasantly surprised] He's what?

TOKIO: Tom took him upstairs—some sports writers.

EDDIE: A half hour before a fight? What is Moody trying to do?

TOKIO: Tom's the boss.

EDDIE: Looka, Tokio—in the future you are gonna take your orders from me! [Pointing to Siggie and Mr. Bonaparte] Who is this?

TOKIO: Joe's relatives.

EDDIE: [Going over to them] Is that his father?

MR. BONAPARTE: [Somberly] Yes, thisa his father. SIGGIE: And this is his brother-in-law. Joe sent passes up the house. We just got here. I thought it was in Coney Island—it's lucky I looked at the tickets. Believe it or not, the old man never seen a fight in his life! Is it human?

EDDIE: [Coldly] Shut your mouth a minute! This is The Arena—Bonaparte is fighting a good man tonight—

SIGGIE: Ahh, that Lombardo's a bag of oats!

EDDIE: When Bonaparte goes in there I like him to have one thing on his mind—fighting! I hope you understand me. An' I don't like to find you here when I return! I hope you understand that. . . . [After a full glance at them Eddie gracefully exits]

SIGGIE: That's a positive personality!

токю: That's Eddie Fuseli.

siggie: Momma-mia! No wonder I smelled gun powder! [Turning to Mr. Bonaparte] Pop, that's a paradox in human behavior: he shoots you for a nickel—then for fifty bucks he sends you flowers!

TOKIO: [Referring to the distant bell] That's the next bout.

SIGGIE: [To Mr. Bonaparte] Come on, we don't wanna miss the whole show.

MR. BONAPARTE: I waita for Joe.

siggie: You heard what Fuseli said-

MR. BONAPARTE: [With somber stubbornness] I gonna wait!

siggie: Listen, pop, you—

MR. BONAPARTE: [With sudden force] I say I gonna wait!

SIGGIE: [Handing Mr. Bonaparte a ticket] Ticket. [Shrugging] Good-bye, you're letting flies in! [Siggie exits jauntily. Mr. Bonaparte silently watches Tokio work over the fighter's materials. A Second comes in, puts a pail under the table where Tokio hovers, and exits. Pepper White, his head turned, watches Mr. Bonaparte as he hums a song]

PEPPER:

Oh, Sweet Dardanella, I love your harem eyes, Oh, Sweet Dardanella, I'm a lucky fellow to get such a prize. . . .

[To Mr. Bonaparte] So you're Bonaparte's little boy, Buddy? Why didn't you say so before? Come over here and shake my hand.

[Mr. Bonaparte does so]

PEPPER: Tell Bonaparte I like to fight him.

MR. BONAPARTE: Why?

PEPPER: I like to beat him up.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Naïvely, not amused] Why? You don't like him?

PEPPER: Don't kid me, Buddy! [A Call Boy looks in at the door]

CALL BOY: Pepper White! Ready, Pepper White! [Call Boy exits. Pepper White slips off the table and begins to change his shoes]

PEPPER: [To Mr. Bonaparte] When I get back I'll explain you all the ins and outs. [A Second enters, takes a pail from Mickey and exits. Lorna enters]
PEPPER: [Indignantly] Who told girls to come in LORNA: Modest? Close your eyes. Is Moody . . . ? [Suddenly seeing Mr. Bonaparte] Hello Mr. Bonaparte!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Glad to see a familiar face]

Hello, hello, Missa Moon! Howa you feel?

LORNA: What brings you to this part of the world?

MR. BONAPARTE: [Somberly] I come-a to see Joe. . . .

LORNA: Why, what's wrong?

MR. BONAPARTE: [With a slow shrug] He don't come-a to see me. . . .

LORNA: Does he know you're here?

MR. BONAPARTE: No. [Lorna looks at him sympathetically]

LORNA: [Finally] It's a three-ring circus, isn't it? MR. BONAPARTE: How you mean?

LORNA: Oh, I mean you . . . and him . . . and other people . . .

MR. BONAPARTE: I gonna see how he fight.

LORNA: I owe you a report. I wish I had good news for you, but I haven't.

MR. BONAPARTE: Yes, I know . . . he gotta wild wolf inside—eat him up!

LORNA: You could build a city with his ambition to be somebody.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Sadly, shaking his head] No . . . burn down!

[Now the outside door is thrust open—the distant bell clangs. Joe enters, behind him Moody and Roxy. Joe stops in his tracks when he sees Lorna and his father together—the last two persons in the world he wants to see now. His hands are already bandaged, a bathrobe is thrown around his shoulders]

JOE: Hello, poppa. . . .

MR. BONAPARTE: Hello, Joe. . . .

JOE: [Turning to Tokio] Throw out the girls—this isn't a hotel bedroom!

MOODY: That's no way to talk! JOE: [Coolly] I talk as I please!

MOODY: [Angrily] The future Mrs. Moody—

JOE: I don't want her here!

LORNA: He's right, Tom. Why fight about it? [She exits]

JOE: [To Moody] Also, I don't want to see writers again before a fight; it makes me nervous!

ROXY: [Softly, for a wonder] They're very important, Joe-

JOE: I'm important! My mind must be clear before I fight. I have to think before I go in. Don't you know that yet?

ROXY: [Suddenly] Yeah, we know—you're a stoodent—you gotta look in your notes.

JOE: What's funny about that? I do, I do!!

ROXY: [Retreating] So I said you do! [Pepper White coines forward, about to exit; to Moody]

PEPPER: How 'bout a bout with Napoleon?

MOODY: On your way, louse!

PEPPER: [With a grin] Pickin' setups?

[Joe suddenly turns and starts for Pepper. Tokio quickly steps in between the two boys]

TOKIO: Save it for the ring!

[The two fighters glare at each other. Joe slowly turns and starts back for the table]

PEPPER: You think he'll be the champ? Where'd you ever read about a cock-eye champ?

[Joe spins around, speeds across the room— Pepper is on the floor! Mickey now starts for Joe. Tokio starts for Mickey. Pepper gets up off the floor and finds himself occupied with Moody. For a moment the fight is general. Eddie Fuseli enters. All see him. The fighting magically stops on the second]

EDDIE: What's amatter? Cowboys and Indians? [To Pepper] Out!

[Mickey and Pepper sullenly exit]

EDDIE: [To Moody] I'm lookin' for you! You're a manager and a half! You and your fat friend! [Meaning Roxy] You think this boy is a toy?

JOE: Eddie's the only one here who understands me.

MOODY: Who the hell wantsa understand you! I got one wish—for Lombardo to give you the business! The quicker he taps you off tonight, the better! You gotta be took down a dozen pegs! I'm versus you! Completely versus!

EDDIE: [Quietly, to Moody] Moody, your brains is in your feet! This is how you handle a coming champ, to give him the jitters before a bout? Go out and take some air! . . . [Seeing Eddie's quiet deadliness, Moody swallows his wrath and exits; Roxy follows with pursed lips]

EDDIE: Lay down, Joe-take it easy.

[Joe sits on a table]

EDDIE: Who hurt you, Joe? Someone hurt your feelings?

JOE: Everything's all right.

EDDIE: Tokio, I put fifty bucks on Bonaparte's nose for you. It's my appreciation to you. . . .

TOKIO: Thanks.

EDDIE: [Of Mr. Bonaparte] Whatta you want me to do with him?

JOE: Leave him here.

EDDIE: Tell me if you want something. . . .

JOE: Nothing.

EDDIE: Forget that Miss Moon. Stop lookin' down her dress. Go out there and kill Lombardo! Send him out to Woodlawn! Tear his skull off! . . . as I know Bonaparte can do it! [Eddie gives Mr. Bonaparte a sharp look and exits. There is silence intensified by the distant clang of the bell and the muted roar of The Crowd. Tokio looks over at Mr. Bonaparte who has been silently seated on the bench all this time]

JOE: [Not quite knowing what to say] How is Anna, poppa?

MR. BONAPARTE: Fine.

JOE: Siggie watching the fights?

MR. BONAPARTE: Yes. . . .

JOE: You look fine. . . .

MR. BONAPARTE: Yes, feela good. . . .

JOE: Why did you send that money back? [There is no answer] Why did you come here? . . . You sit there like my conscience. . . .

MR. BONAPARTE: Why you say so?

JOE: Poppa, I have to fight, no matter what you say or think! This is my profession! I'm out for fame and fortune, not to be different or artistic! I don't intend to be ashamed of my life!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Standing up] Yeah, I understanda you...,

JOE: Go out and watch the fights.

MR. BONAPARTE: [Somberly] Yeah . . . you fight. Now I know . . . is'a too late for music. The men musta be free an' happy for music . . . not like-a you. Now I see whatta you are . . . I give-a you every word to fight . . . I sorry for you. . .

[Silence. The distant roar of The Crowd climbs up and falls down; the bell clangs again]

TOKIO: [Gently] I'll have to ask you to leave, Mr. Bonaparte. . . .

MR. BONAPARTE: [Holding back his tears] Joe . . . I hope-a you win every fight. [Mr. Bonaparte slowly exits. As he opens and closes the door the roar of The Crowd swells up for an instant] токю: Lay down, Joe. There's five minutes left to tune you up.

JOE: [In a low voice] That's right, tune me up. ... [Joe stretches out on his stomach and Tokio's busy hands start up the back of his legs]

TOKIO: [Working with steady briskness] I never worried less about a boy . . . in my life. You're a real sweetheart. . . .

[Suddenly Joe begins to cry in his arms. Tokio looks down, momentarily hesitates in his work -then slowly goes ahead with his massaging hands. The Boy continues to shake with silent sobs. Again the bell clangs in the distance]

TOKIO: [In a soft caressing voice] You're getting good, honey. Maybe I never told you that before. I seen it happen before. [Continuing the massaging] It seems to happen sudden—a fighter gets good. He gets easy and graceful. He learns how to save himself—no energy wasted . . . he slips and slides—he travels with the punch. . . . Oh, sure, I like the way you're shaping up. [Tokio continues massaging. Joe is silent. His sobbing stops. After a moment Tokio continues] What was you saying about Lombardo's trick? I understood you to say he's a bull's-eye for a straight shot from the inside. I think you're right, Joe, but that kind of boy is liable to meet you straight-on in a clinch and give you the back of his head under the chin. Watch out for that.

JOE: He needs a straight punch. . . . [Joe suddenly sits up on the table, his legs dangling] Now I'm alone. They're all against me-Moody, the girl ... you're my family now, Tokio-you and Eddie! I'll show them all—nobody stands in my way! My father's had his hand on me for years. No more. No more for her either—she had her chance! When a bullet sings through the air it has no past—only a future—like me! Nobody, nothing stands in my way! [In a sudden spurt of feeling Joe starts sparring around lightly in a shadow boxing routine, Tokio smiles with satisfaction. Now the roar of The Crowd reaches a frenzied shriek and hangs there. The bell clangs rapidly several times. The roar of The Crowd settles down again]

TOKIO: That sounds like the kill.

[Joe draws his bathrobe around him and prances on his toes

JOE: I'm a new boy tonight! I could take two Lombardos! [Vigorously shaking out his bandaged hands above his head] Hallelujah! We're on the Millionaire Express tonight! Nobody gets me!

[The door is thrust open and a Call Boy shouts] CALL BOY: Bonaparte, ready. Bonaparte, ready.

[Pepper White and Mickey enter as the Call Boy speeds away. Pepper is flushed with victory]

PEPPER: [To Joe] Tell me when you want it; you can have it the way I just give it to Pulaski!

[Joe looks Pepper in the face, flexes his hands several times and suddenly breaks out in laughter, to Pepper's astonishment. Joe and Tokio exit. Pepper throws off his robe and displays his bodyl

PEPPER: Look me over-not a mark. How do you like that for class! I'm in a hurry to grab a cab to Flushing.

MICKEY: [Impassively] Keep away from her.

PEPPER: I don't even hear you. MICKEY: Keep away from her!

PEPPER: I go for her like a bee and the flower. MICKEY: [In a droning prophetic voice] The flower is married. Her husband is an excitable Armenian from the Orient. There will be hell to pay! Keep away from her!

[Now in the distance is heard the indistinct high voice of the announcer

PEPPER: You oughta get me a fight with that cock-eye Napoleon-insteada sticking your nose where it don't belong! I could slaughter him in next to nothing.

MICKEY: [Impassively] If you could make his weight and slaughter him, you'd be the next world's champ. But you can't make his weight, you can't slaughter him, and you can't be the champ. Why the hell don't you take a shower?

[The bell clangs—in the arena, Joe's fight is on] PEPPER: [Plaintively, beginning to dress at his locker] If my girl don't like me without a shower, I'll tell her a thing or two.

MICKEY: If her husband don't tell you first.

[The roar of The Crowd swells up as the door opens and Mr. Bonaparte enters. He is unusually agitated. He looks at Pepper and Mickey and sits on a bench. The roar of The Crowd mounts higher than before, then drops]

PEPPER: [To Mr. Bonaparte] What's the matter with you?

MR. BONAPARTE: [Shaking his head] Don't like to see . . .

PEPPER: [Delighted] Why? Your boy gettin's meared?

MR. BONAPARTE: They fighta for money, no?

MR. BONAPARTE: If they was fight for cause or for woman, woulda not be so bad.

PEPPER: [Still dressing behind the locker door] I fight for money and I like it. I don't fight for under a thousand bucks. Do I, Mickey?

MICKEY: Nope.

PEPPER: [Boasting naïvely] I didn't fight for under a thousand for five years. Did I, Mickey?

MICKEY: [Impassively] Nope.

PEPPER: I get a thousand bucks tonight, don't I? MICKEY: Nope.

PEPPER: [Up like a shot] How much? How much tonight?

MICKEY: Twelve hundred bucks.

PEPPER: What? Mickey, I oughta bust you in the nose. How many times do I have to say I don't fight for under one thousand bucks! [To Mr. Bonaparte] Now you see what I'm up against with this manager!

MICKEY: [Impassively] Okay, you'll get a thousand.

PEPPER: I better, Buddy! That's all I say—I better! [To Mr. Bonaparte] I tell him I want to fight your kid and he don't lift a finger.

[The roar of The Crowd crescendos and drops down again]

MICKEY: You don't rate no fight with Bonaparte. [To Mr. Bonaparte, of Pepper] He's an old man, a fossil!

MR. BONAPARTE: Who?

MICKEY: Him-he's twenty-nine.

MR. BONAPARTE: Old?

MICKEY: In this business, twenty-nine is ancient.

PEPPER: My girl don't think so. MICKEY: Keep away from her.

[The roar of The Crowd mounts up to a devilish shriek]

PEPPER: Wow, is your boy getting schlocked!

MR. BONAPARTE: My boy isa win.

PEPPER: Yeah, and that's why you ran away?

MR. BONAPARTE: Whatta the difference who's-a win? Is terrible to see!

PEPPER: [Grinning] If I wasn't in a hurry, I'd wait around to help pick up your little Joie's head off the floor. [He draws on a sport shirt]

MICKEY: [To Pepper] What are you wearing a polo shirt on a winter night for?

PEPPER: For crying out loud, I just bought it! ... So long, Mr. Bonaparte.

MR. BONAPARTE: I aska you please—whatta happen to a boy's hands when he fight a longa time?

PEPPER: [Holding up his fists] Take a look at mine—I got a good pair. See those knuckles? Flat!

MR. BONAPARTE: Broke?

PEPPER: Not broke, flat!—pushed down!

MR. BONAPARTE: Hurt?
PEPPER: You get used to it.

MR. BONAPARTE: Can you use them?

PEPPER: Go down the hall and look at Pulaski. MR. BONAPARTE: Can you open thees-a hands?

PEPPER: What for?

MR. BONAPARTE: [Gently touching the fists] So strong, so hard . . .

PEPPER: You said it, Buddy. So long, Buddy. [To Mickey] Take my stuff.

MICKEY: Sam'll take it after. Keep away from her!

[Pepper looks at Mickey with a sardonic grin and exits followed by Mickey]

MR. BONAPARTE: $[To\ himself]$ So strong . . . so useless . . .

[The roar of The Crowd mounts up and calls for a kill. Mr. Bonaparte trembles. For a moment he sits quietly on the bench. Then he goes to the door of the shower room and looks around at the boxing paraphernalia. In the distance the bell begins to clang repeatedly. Mr. Bonaparte stares in the direction of the arena. He goes to the exit door. The crowd is cheering and howling. Mr. Bonaparte hesitates a moment at the door and then rapidly walks back to the bench, where he sits. Head cocked, he listens for a moment. The roar of The Crowd is heated, demanding and hateful. Suddenly Mr. Bonaparte jumps to his feet. He is in a murderous mood. He shakes his clenched fist in the direction of the noise—he roars aloud. The roar of The Crowd dies down. The door opens, Pepper's second, Sam, enters softly whistling to himself. Deftly he begins to sling together Pepper's paraphernalia]

MR. BONAPARTE: What's a happen in the fight?

SAM: Knockout.

MR. BONAPARTE: Who? SAM: Lombardo's stiff.

[Mr. Bonaparte slowly sits. Softly whistling, Sam exits with the paraphernalia. The outside door is flung open. In come Joe, Tokio, Moody and Roxy, who is elated beyond sanity. Joe's eyes glitter; his face is hard and flushed. He has won by a knockout]

ROXY: [Almost dancing] My boy! My darling boy! My dear darling boy!

[Silently Joe sits on the edge of the table, ignoring his father after a glance. His robe drops from his shoulders. Roxy turns to Moody]

ROXY: How do you like it, Tom? He knocks him out in two rounds!

MOODY: [Stiffly to Joe] It's good business to call the sports writers in—

ROXY: That's right, give a statement!

[Moody gives Joe a rapid glance and hurriedly exits]

ROXY: I'm collecting a bet on you. All my faith and patience is rewarded. [As he opens the door he almost knocks over Eddie Fuseli] Haha! How do you like it, Eddie? Haha! [He exits. Eddie Fuseli closes the door and stands with his back to it. Tokio moves up to Joe and begins to remove a glove?

TOKIO: [Gently] You're a real sweetheart.... [Tokio removes the sweaty glove and begins to fumble with the lace of the other one. Joe carefully moves his glove out of Tokio's reach, resting it on his opposite arm]

JOE: [Almost proudly] Better cut it off. . .

[Mr. Bonaparte is watching tensely. Eddie watches from the door] токіо: . . . Broke? . . .

JOE: [Holding the hand out proudly] Yes, it's broke. . . .

[Tokio slowly reaches for a knife. He begins carefully to cut the glove]

JOE: Hallelujah!! It's the beginning of the world! [Mr. Bonaparte, lips compressed, slowly turns his head away. Eddie watches with inner excitement and pleasure: Joe has become a fighter. Tokio continues with his work. Joe begins to laugh loudly, victoriously, exultantly—with a deep thrill of satisfaction]

SLOW FADEOUT

ACT III. SCENE I.

Moody's office, six months later. Present are Moody, acting the persuasive salesman with two sports writers, Drake and Lewis; Roxy Gottlieb being helpful in his usual manner; Tokio, to one side, characteristically quiet . . . and Joe Bonaparte. Bonaparte sits on the desk and diffidently swings his legs as he eats a sandwich. His success has added a certain bellicosity to his attitude; it has changed his clothing to silk shirts and custom-made suits.

MOODY: He's got his own style. He won't rush—ROXY: Nobody claims our boy's Niagra Falls.

DRAKE: [A newspaperman for twenty years] Except himself!

MOODY: You newspaper boys are right.

DRAKE: We newspaper boys are always right!

MOODY: He won't take chances tomorrow night if he can help it. He'll study his man, pick out flaws—then shoot at them.

JOE: [Casually] It won't matter a helluva lot if I win late in the bout or near the opening. The main thing with Bonaparte is to win.

DRAKE: [Dryly] Well, what does Bonaparte expect to do tomorrow night?

JOE: [As dryly] Win.

MOODY: Why shouldn't we have a win from the Chocolate Drop? Look at our record!—

LEWIS: [Good-natured and slow] We just wanna get an impression—

MOODY: Seventeen knockouts? Fulton, Lombardo, Guffey Talbot—?

JOE: Phil Weiner . . .

MOODY: Weiner?

ROXY: That's no powderpuff hitter!

LEWIS: In this fight tomorrow night, can you name the round?

JOE: Which round would you like?

DRAKE: You're either a genius or an idiot!

MOODY: Joe don't mean-

DRAKE: [Sharply] Let him talk for himself.

JOE: [Getting off the desk] Listen, Drake, I'm not the boy I used to be—the honeymoon's over. I don't blush and stammer these days. Bonaparte goes in and slugs with the best. In the bargain his brain is better than the best. That's the truth; why deny it?

DRAKE: The last time you met Chocolate you never even touched him!

JOE: It's almost two years since I "never even touched him." Now I know how!

MOODY: What Joe means to sav-

DRAKE: He's the genuine and only modest cockeyed wonder!

JOE: What good is modesty? I'm a fighter! The whole essence of prizefighting is immodesty! "I'm better than you are—I'll prove it by breaking your face in!" What do you expect? A conscience and a meek smile? I don't believe that bull the meek'll inherit the earth!

DRAKE: Oh, so it's the earth you want!

JOE: I know what I want—that's my business! But I don't want your guff!

DRAKE: I have two sons of my own—I like boys. But I'm a son-of-a-bitch if I can stomach your conceit!

MOODY: [Trying to save the situation] They serve a helluva rum Collins across the street—

DRAKE: Bonaparte, I'll watch for Waterloo with more than interest!

MOODY: Why don't we run across for a drink? How 'bout some drinks?

DRAKE: Tom, you can buy me twenty drinks and I still won't change my mind about him. [He exits] LEWIS: [Smiling] You're all right, Bonaparte. JOE: Thanks....

LEWIS: [Clinching a cigarette at the desk] How's that big blonde of yours, Tom?

MOODY: Fine.

LEWIS: How does she feel about the wedding bells? Sunday is it?

[This is news to Joe, and Moody knows it is] MOODY: [Nervously] Happy, the way I am. Yeah, Sunday.

ROXY: How about the drinks? We'll drink to everybody's health!

LEWIS: [To Joe] Good luck tomorrow.

JOE: Thanks.... [They exit, Moody throwing a resentful look at Joe. Joe and Tokio are left. In the silence Joe goes back to the remains of his lunch]
TOKIO: That Drake is a case.

JOE: [Pushing the food away] They don't make cheesecake the way they used to when I was a boy.

Or maybe I don't like it any more. When are they getting married?

токю: Moody? Sunday.

JOE: Those writers hate me.

TOKIO: You give them too much lip.

JOE: [Looking down at his clenched fists] I'd rather give than take it. That's one reason I became a fighter. When did Moody get his divorce?

TOKIO: Few weeks ago. . . . [Cannily] Why don't you forget Lorna?

JOE: [As if not understanding] What?

TOKIO: I'll say it again . . . why not forget her? [No answer comes] Joe, you're loaded with love. Find something to give it to. Your heart ain't in fighting . . . your hate is. But a man with hate and nothing else . . . he's half a man . . . and half a man . . . is no man. Find something to love, or someone. Am I stepping on your toes?

JOE: [Coldly] I won't be unhappy if you mind your business.

TOKIO: Okay. . . . [Tokio goes to the door, stops there] Watch your dinner tonight. No girls either. JOE: Excuse me for saying that—

TOKIO: [With a faint smile] Okay. [Tokio opens the door and Lorna Moon enters. Tokio smiles at her and exits. She carries a pack of newspapers under her arm. Joe and she do not know what to say to each other—they wish they had not met here. Lorna crosses and puts the newspapers on the desk. She begins to bang through the desk drawers, looking for the scissors]

JOE: I hear you're making the leap tomorrow.

LORNA: Sunday. . . .

JOE: Sunday. [Intense silence]

LORNA: [To say anything] I'm looking for the scissors. . . .

JOE: Who're you cutting up today?

LORNA: [Bringing out the shears] Items on Bonaparte, for the press book. [She turns and begins to unfold and clip a sheet of newspaper. Joe is at a loss for words]

JOE: [Finally] Congratulations. . . .

LORNA: [Without turning] Thanks. . .

[In a sudden irresistible surge Joe tears the newspaper out of Lorna's hands and hurls them behind the desk. The two stand facing each other]

JOE: When I speak to you, look at me!

LORNA: What would you like to say? [They stand face to face, straining. Finally]

JOE: Marry anyone you like! LORNA: Thanks for permission!

JOE: Queen Lorna, the tramp of Newark!

LORNA: You haven't spoken to me for months. Why break your silence?

JOE: You're a historical character for me—dead and buried!

LORNA: Then everything's simple; go about your business.

JOE: Moody's right for you—perfect—the mating of zero and zero!

LORNA: I'm not sorry to marry Tom-

JOE: [Scornfully] That's from the etiquette book—page twelve: "When you marry a man say you like it!"

LORNA: I know I could do worse when I look at you. When did you look in the mirror last? Getting to be a killer! You're getting to be like Fuseli! You're not the boy I cared about, not you. You murdered that boy with the generous face—God knows where you hid the body! I don't know you.

JOE: I suppose I never kissed your mouth—

LORNA: What do you want from me? Revenge? Sorry—we're all out of revenge today!

JOE: I wouldn't look at you twice if they hung you naked from a Christmas tree!

[At this moment Eddie Fuseli enters with a pair of packages. He looks intently at Lorna, then crosses and puts the packages on the desk. He and Joe are dressed almost identically. Lorna exits without a word. Eddie is aware of what has happened but begins to talk casually about the packages]

EDDIE: This one's your new headgear. This is shirts from Jacobs Brothers. He says the neck bands are gonna shrink, so I had him make sixteens—they'll fit you after one washing. [Holding up a shirt! You like that color?

JOE: Thanks.

EDDIE: Your brother-in-law drove me over. Picked him up on 49th. Don't you ever see them no more?

JOE: [Sharply] What for?

EDDIE: What's a matter?

JOE: Why? You see a crowd around here, Eddie? EDDIE: No.

JOE: That's right, you don't! But I do! I see a crowd of Eddies all around me, suffocating me, burying me in good times and silk shirts!

EDDIE: [Dialing the telephone] You wanna go to the Scandals tonight? I got tickets. [Into the telephone] Charley? Fuseli is speaking. . . I'm giving four to five on Bonaparte tomorrow. . . . Four G's worth. . . . Yes. [Hanging up the phone] It's gonna be a good fight tomorrow.

JOE: [Belligerently] How do you know?

EDDIE: I know Bonaparte. I got eighteen thousand spread out on him tomorrow night.

JOE: Suppose Bonaparte loses?

EDDIE: I look at the proposition from all sides—I know he'll win.

JOE: What the hell do you think I am? A machine? Maybe I'm lonely, maybe—

EDDIE: You wanna walk in a parade? Everybody's lonely. Get the money and you're not so lonely.

JOE: I want some personal life.

EDDIE: I give Bonaparte a good personal life. I got loyalty to his cause. . . .

JOE: You use me like a gun! Your loyalty's to keep me oiled and polished!

EDDIE: A year ago Bonaparte was a rookie with a two-pants suit. Now he wears the best, eats the best, sleeps the best. He walks down the street respected—the golden boy! They howl their heads off when Bonaparte steps in the ring... and I done it for him!

JOE: There are other things. . . .

EDDIE: There's no other things! Don't think so much—it could make you very sick! You're in this up to your neck. You owe me a lot—I don't like you to forget. You better be on your toes when you step in that ring tomorrow night. [Eddie turns and begins to dial the telephone]

JOE: Your loyalty makes me shiver. [Joe starts for the door]

EDDIE: Take the shirts.

JOE: What do I want them for? I can only wear one at a time. . . .

[Eddie speaks into the phone]

EDDIE: Meyer? . . . Fuseli is speaking. . . . I'm giving four to five on Bonaparte tomorrow. . . . Two? . . . Yeah. . . .

[About to exit, Joe stands at the door and watches Eddie as he calmly begins to dial the phone again]

MEDIUM FADEOUT

SCENE II.

The next night. The lights fade in on an empty stage. We are in the same dressing room as seen in Act Two. Far in the distance is heard the same roar of The Crowd. The distant bell clangs menacingly. The room is shadows and patches of light. The silence here has its own ugly dead quality. Lorna Moon enters. She looks around nervously; she lights a cigarette; this reminds her to rouge her lips; she puffs the cigarette. The distant bell clangs again. Eddie Fuseli enters, pale and tense. He sees Lorna and stops short in his tracks. There is an intense silence as they look at each other.

LORNA: How's the fight?

BDDIE: I like to talk to you.

LORNA: Is Joe still on his feet?

EDDIE: Take a month in the country, Miss Moon.

LORNA: Why?

EDDIE: [Repressing a murderous mood] Give the boy . . . or move away.

LORNA: I get married tomorrow. . . .

EDDIE: You heard my request-give him or go!

LORNA: Don't Moody count?

EDDIE: If not for Bonaparte they'd find you in a barrel long ago—in the river or a bush!

LORNA: I'm not afraid of you. . . .

[The distant bell clangs]

EDDIE: [After turning his head and listening] That's the beginning of the eighth. Bonaparte's unsettled—fighting like a drunken sailor. He can't win no more, unless he knocks the Chocolate out. . . .

LORNA: [At a complete loss] Don't look at me ... what'd you ... I ...

EDDIE: Get outa town!

[The roar of The Crowd mounts to a demand for a kill]

EDDIE: [Listening intently] He's like a burn tonight . . . and a burn done it! You! [The roar grows fuller] I can't watch him get slaughtered. . . .

LORNA: I couldn't watch it myself.... [The bell clangs loudly several times. The roar of The Crowd hangs high in the air] What's happening now?

EDDIE: Someone's getting murdered. . . .

LORNA: It's me. . . .

EDDIE: [Quietly, intensely] That's right . . . if he lost . . . the trees are ready for your coffin. [The roar of The Crowd tones down] You can go now. I don't wanna make a scandal around his name. . . . I'll find you when I want you. Don't be here when they carry him in.

LORNA: [At a complete loss] Where do you want me to go?

EDDIE: [Suddenly releasing his wrath] Get out amy sight! You turned down the sweetest boy who ever walked in shoes! You turned him down, the golden boy, that king among the ju-ven-niles! He gave you his hand—you spit in his face! You led him on like Gertie's whoore! You sold him down the river! And now you got the nerve to stand here, to wait and see him bleeding from the mouth!—

LORNA: Fuseli, for God's sake-

EDDIE: Get outa my sight!

LORNA: Fuseli, please-

EDDIE: Outa my sight, you nickel whoore! [Completely enraged and out of control, Eddie half brings his gun out from under his left armpit. Joe appears in the doorway. Behind him are Roxy, Moody and a Second]

JOE: Eddie! [Eddie whirls around. The others enter the room. In the ensuing silence, Moody, sensing what has happened, crosses to Lorna]

LORNA: [Quietly] What happened?

ROXY: What happened? [He darts forward and picks up Joe's arm in the sign of victory. The arm drops back limply] The monarch of the masses!

EDDIE: [To the Second] Keep everybody out. Only the newspaper boys.

[The Second exits an

[The Second exits and closes the door. Joe sits on a table. Physically he is a very tired boy. There is a high puff under one eye; the other is completely closed. His body is stained with angry splotches]

TOKIO: [Gently] I have to hand it to you, Joe....
ROXY: [Explaining to the frigid Eddie, elaborately]
The beginning of the eighth: first the bell! Next the Chocolate Drop comes out like a waltz clog, confident. Oh, he was so confident! Haha! The next thing I know the Chocolate's on the floor, the referee lifts our arm, we got on our bathrobe and we're here in the dressing room! How do you like it? EDDIE: [Narrowly] I like it.

TOKIO: [Taking off Joe's gloves] I'll have you feelin' better in a minute. [After which he cuts the tapes]

JOE: I feel all right.

EDDIE: [To Tokio] Gimme his gloves.

MOODY: [Wary of Joe] That's a bad lump under your eye.

JOE: Not as bad as the Chocolate Drop got when he hit the floor!

ROXY: Darling, how you gave it to him! Not to my enemies!

JOE: 'Twas a straight right—with no trimmings or apologies! Aside from fouling me in the second and fifth—

MOODY: I called them on it— ROXY: I seen the bastard—

JOE: That second time I nearly went through the floor. I gave him the fury of a lifetime in that final punch! [Eddie has taken the soggy boxing gloves for his own property. Tokio is daubing the bruise under Joe's eye] And did you hear them cheer! [Bitterly, as if reading a news report] Flash! As thousands cheer, that veritable whirlwind Bonaparte—that veritable cock-eye wonder, Bonaparte—he comes from behind in the eighth stanza to slaughter the Chocolate Drop and clinch a bout with the champ! Well, how do you like me, boys? Am I good or am I good?

ROXY: Believe me!

TOKIO: [Attempting to settle Joe] You won the right for a crack at the title. You won it fair and clean. Now lay down. . . .

JOE: [In a vehement outburst] I'd like to go outside my weight and beat up the whole damn world!

MOODY: [Coldly] Well, the world's your oyster now!

TOKIO: [Insistently] Take it easy. Lemme fix that eye, Joe-

[Now a bustling little Irishman, Driscoll, hustles into the room]

DRISCOLL: Who's got the happy boy's gloves?

EDDIE: Here . . . why?

[Driscoll rapidly takes the gloves, "breaks" and examines them]

TOKIO: What's the matter, "Drisc"?

JOE: What's wrong?

DRISCOLL: [Handing the gloves back to Eddie] Chocolate's a sick boy. Your hands are clean. [Driscoll hustles for the door. Joe is up and to him] JOE: What happened?

DRISCOLL: [Bustling] It looks like the Pride of Baltimore is out for good. Change your clothes.

JOE: How do you mean?

DRISCOLL: Just like I said—out! [Driscoll pats Joe's shoulder, hustles out, closing the door in Joe's face. Joe slowly sits on the nearest bench. Immediately Tokio comes to him, as tender as a mother]

TOKIO: You didn't foul him—you're a clean fighter. You're so honest in the ring it's stupid. If something happened, it's an accident. [The others stand around stunned, not knowing what to do or say]

MOODY: [Very worried] That's right, there's nothing to worry about.

ROXY: [Ditto] That's right. . . .

JOE: Gee... [Joe stands up, slowly crosses the room and sits on the table, head in his hands, his back to the others. No one knows what to say]

EDDIE: [To Moody] Go out there and size up the situation.

[Moody, glad of the opportunity to leave the room, turns to the door which is suddenly violently thrust open. Barker, the Chocolate Drop's manager, pushes Moody into the room with him, leaving the door open. From outside a small group of curious people look in. Barker, bereft of his senses, grabs Moody by the coat lapel

BARKER: Do you know it? Do you know it? MOODY: Now wait a minute, Barker—

[Barker runs over to Joe and screams]

BARKER: You murdered my boy! He's dead! You killed him!

TOKIO: [Getting between Joe and Barker] Just a minute!

BARKER: [Literally wringing his hands] He's dead! Chocolate's dead!

TOKIO: We're very sorry about it. Now pull your-self together.

[Eddie crosses the room and slams the door shut as Barker points an accusing finger at Joe and screams]

BARKER: This dirty little wop killed my boy!

EDDIE: [Coming to Barker] Go back in your room.

BARKER: Yes he did!! [Eddie's answer is to shove

Barker roughly toward the door, weeping] Yes, he did!!

EDDIE: Get out before I slug your teeth apart!

JOE: [Jumping to his feet] Eddie, for God sakes, don't hit him! Let him alone!

[Eddie immediately desists. Barker stands there, a weeping idiot]

MOODY: Accidents can happen.

BARKER: I know . . . I know. . . .

MOODY: Chocolate fouled us twice.

BARKER: I know, I know. . . . [Barker stammers, gulps and tries to say something more. Suddenly he dashes out of the room. There is a long silent pause during which Joe sits down again]

EDDIE: We'll have to wait for an investigation.

TOKIO: [To Joe] Don't blame yourself for nothing. . . .

JOE: That poor guy . . . with those sleepy little eyes. . . .

ROXY: [Solemnly] It's in the hands of God, a thing like that.

[Lewis, the sports writer, tries to enter the room]

EDDIE: [Herding him out] Stay outside. [To Moody] See what's happening? [Moody immediately leaves] Everybody out—leave Bonaparte to calm hisself. I'll watch the door.

TOKIO: Don't worry, Joe. [He exits, followed by Roxy. Eddie turns and looks at Lorna]

EDDIE: You too, Miss Moon—this ain't no cocktail lounge.

LORNA: I'll stay here. [Eddie looks at her sharply, shifts his glance from her to Joe and back again; he exits] Joe. . . .

JOE: Gee, that poor boy. . . .

LORNA: [Holding herself off] But it wasn't your fault.

JOE: That's right—it wasn't my fault!

LORNA: You didn't mean it!

JOE: That's right—I didn't mean it! I wouldn't want to do that, would I? Everybody knows I wouldn't want to kill a man. Lorna, you know it!

LORNA: Of course!

JoE: But I did it! That's the thing—I did it! What will my father say when he hears I murdered a man? Lorna, I see what I did. I murdered myself, too! I've been running around in circles. Now I'm smashed! That's the truth. Yes, I was a real sparrow, and I wanted to be a fake eagle! But now I'm hung up by my finger tips—I'm no good—my feet are off the earth!

LORNA: [In a sudden burst, going to Joe] Joe, I love you! We love each other. Need each other!

JOE: Lorna darling, I see what's happened!

LORNA: You wanted to conquer the world— JOE: Yes—

LORNA: But it's not the kings and dictators who do it—it's that kid in the park—

JOE: Yes, that boy who might have said, "I have myself; I am what I want to be!"

LORNA: And now, tonight, here, this minute—finding yourself again—that's what makes you a champ. Don't you see that?

JOE: Yes, Lorna—yes!

LORNA: It isn't too late to tell the world good evening again!

JOE: With what? These fists?

LORNA: Give up the fighting business!

JOE: Tonight!

LORNA: Yes, and go back to your music-

JOE: But my hands are ruined. I'll never play again! What's left, Lorna? Half a man, nothing, useless. . . .

LORNA: No, we're left! Two together! We have each other! Somewhere there must be happy boys and girls who can teach us the way of life! We'll find some city where poverty's no shame—where music is no crime!—where there's no war in the streets—where a man is glad to be himself, to live and make his woman herself!

JOE: No more fighting, but where do we go? LORNA: Tonight? Joe, we ride in your car. We speed through the night, across the park, over the Triboro Bridge—

JOE: [Taking Lorna's arms in his trembling hands] Ride! That's it, we ride—clear my head. We'll drive through the night. When you mow down the night with headlights, nobody gets you! You're on top of the world then—nobody laughs! That's it—speed! We're off the earth—unconnected! We don't have to think!! That's what speed's for, an easy way to live! Lorna darling, we'll burn up the night! [He turns and as he begins to throw his street clothes out of his locker]

MEDIUM FADEOUT

SCENE III.

Late the same night. In the Bonaparte home sit Eddie Fuseli, Moody, Roxy, and Siggie, drinking homemade wine, already half drunk. Mr. Bonaparte stands on the other side of the room, looking out of the window. Frank sits near him, a bandage around his head. Moody is at the telephone as the lights fade in.

MOODY: [Impatiently] . . . 'lo? Hello! . . .

SIGGIE: I'll tell you why we need another drink. . . .

ROXY: No, I'll tell you. . . .

MOODY: [Turning] Quiet! For Pete's sake! I can't hear myself think! [Turning to the phone] Hello? . . . This is Moody. Any calls for me? Messages? . . . No sign of Miss Moon? . . . Thanks. Call me if she comes in—the number I gave you before. [Hanging up and returning to his wine glass; to Mr. Bonaparte] I thought you said Joe was coming up here!

MR. BONAPARTE: I say maybe . . .

MOODY: [Sitting] I'll wait another fifteen minutes. [He drinks] siggie: Here's why we need another drink; it's a night of success! Joe's in those lofty brackets from now on! We're gonna move to a better neighborhood, have a buncha kids! [To Mr. Bonaparte] Hey, pop, I wish we had a mortgage so we could pay it off! To the next champ of the world! [Siggie lifts his glass; the others join him]

ROXY: Bonaparte.

EDDIE: Don't you drink, Mr. Bonaparte? SIGGIE: You, too, Frank—it's all in the family.

[Mr. Bonaparte shrugs and comes down, accepting a glass]

ROXY: It's in the nature of a celebration!

MR. BONAPARTE: My son'sa kill a man tonight—what'sa celebrate? What'sa gonna be, heh?

SIGGIE: Ahh, don't worry—they can't do him nothing for that! An accident!

EDDIE: [Coldly, to Mr. Bonaparte] Listen, it's old news. It's been out on the front page two-three hours.

MR. BONAPARTE: Poor color' boy . . .

MOODY: Nobody's fault. Everybody's sorry—we give the mother a few bucks. But we got the next champ! Bottoms up. [All drink, Frank included]

ROXY: [To Mr. Bonaparte] You see how a boy can make a success nowadays?

MR. BONAPARTE: Yeah . . . I see.

EDDIE: [Resenting Mr. Bonaparte's attitude] Do we bother you? If I didn't think Joe was here I don't come up. I don't like nobody to gimme a boycott!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Going back to the window] Helpa you'self to more wine.

SIGGIE: [To Eddie] leave him alone—he don't feel social tonight.

MOODY: Don't worry, Mr. Bonaparte. Looka me—take a lesson from me—I'm not worried. I'm getting married tomorrow—this afternoon!—I don't know where my girl is, but I'm not worried! What for? We're all in clover up to our necks!

SIGGIE: Shh . . . don't wake up my wife.

[Moody suddenly sits heavily; jealousy begins to gnaw at him despite his optimism. Roxy takes another drink. Eddie asks Frank, apropos of his bandaged head]

EDDIE: What's that "Spirit of '76" outfit for? SIGGIE: [Grinning to Eddie] Didn't you hear what he said before? They gave it to him in a strike—

EDDIE: [To Frank] You got a good build—you could be a fighter.

FRANK: I fight....

EDDIE: Yeah? For what?

FRANK: A lotta things I believe in. . . .

[Eddie looks at Frank and appreciates his quality]

EDDIE: Whatta you get for it?

ROXY: [Laughing] Can't you see? A busted head! FRANK: I'm not fooled by a lotta things Joe's fooled by. I don't get autos and custom-made suits. But I get what Joe don't.

EDDIE: What don't he get?

[Mr. Bonaparte comes in and listens intently]

FRANK: [Modestly] The pleasure of acting as you think! The satisfaction of staying where you belong, being what you are . . . at harmony with millions of others!

ROXY: [Pricking up his ears] Harmony? That's music! the family's starting up music again!

FRANK: [Smiling] That's right, that's music-

[Now Moody emphatically stamps his glass down on the table and stands]

MOODY: What's the use waiting around! They won't be back. [Bitterly] Lorna's got a helluva lotta nerve, riding around in Long Island with him! Without even asking me!

SIGGIE: Long Island's famous for the best eating ducks.

EDDIE: [To Moody] You got the champ—you can't have everything.

MOODY: What's that supposed to mean?

EDDIE: [Coldly] That girl belongs to Bonaparte. They're together now, in some roadhouse . . . and they ain't eating duck!

MOODY: [Finally, unsteadily] You don't know what you're talking about!

EDDIE: Moody, what do you figger your interest is worth in Bonaparte?

MOODY: Why?

EDDIE: [Without turning] Roxy . . . are you listening?

ROXY: Yeah. . . .

EDDIE: 'Cause after tonight I'd like to handle Bonaparte myself.

MOODY: . . . Your gall is gorgeous! But I got a contract. . . .

ROXY: Eddie, have a heart—I'm holding a little twenty percent.... [Out of sheer rage Moody drinks more wine; Roxy follows his example]

FRANK: [To Eddie] How much does Joe own on himself?

EDDIE: Thirty percent. After tonight I own the rest.

MOODY: Oh, no! No, sir-ee!!

EDDIE: You're drunk tonight! Tomorrow!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Coming forward] Maybe Joe don't gonna fight no more, after tonight...

EDDIE: Listen, you creep! Why don't you change your tune for a minute!

ROXY: [To Mr. Bonaparte] What're you worried about?

MR. BONAPARTE: My boy usta coulda be great for all men. Whatta he got now, heh? Pardon me fora nota to feel so confident in Joe'sa future! Pardon me fora to be anxious. . . .

EDDIE: [Standing up] I don't like this talk!

SIGGIE: Sit down, pop—you're rocking the boat! Shh! Shh! [He slips out of the room]

ROXY: Does anyone here know what he's talking about?

FRANK: He's trying to say he's worried for Joe. ROXY: But why? Why? Don't he realize this kid's worth a fortune from tonight on? [After giving Eddie a quick glance] Ain't he got brains enough to see two feet ahead? Tell him in Italian—he don't understand our language—this is a festive occasion! To Bonaparte, the Monarch of the Masses! [The telephone rings]

MOODY: [Triumphantly, to Eddie] That's my hotel! You see, you were all wrong! That's Lorna! [Speaking into the telephone] Hello? . . . No. . . . [Turning to Mr. Bonaparte] It's for you. [Moody extends the telephone in Mr. Bonaparte's direction, but the latter stands in his place, unable to move. After a few seconds Frank sees this and briskly moves to the telephone, taking it from Moody. In the meantime Moody has begun to address Eddie with drunken eloquence. Wavering on his feet] There's a constitution in this country, Eddie Fuseli. Every man here enjoys life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness!

FRANK: [Speaking into the telephone] Yes? . . . No, this is his son . . .

[Mr. Bonaparte watches Frank mutely as he listens at the telephone]

MOODY: There's laws in this country, Fuseli—contracts! We live in a civilized world—!

FRANK: [Loudly. to the others] Keep quiet! [Resumes listening] Yes . . . yes. . . .

ROXY: [To Eddie] And there's a God in heaven—don't forget it!

FRANK: [On the telephone] Say it again. . . . [He listens] Yes.

MOODY: [To Eddie] You're a killer! A man tries to do his best—but you're a killer!

[Frank lowers the telephone and comes down to the others]

FRANK: You're all killers!

[Mr. Bonaparte advances a step toward Frank] MR. BONAPARTE: Frank . . . is it . . . ? FRANK: I don't know how to tell you, poppa. . . . MR. BONAPARTE: [Hopefully] Yes? . . .

FRANK: We'll have to go there-

EDDIE: Go where?

FRANK: Both of them . . . they were killed in a crash-

EDDIE: Who?! What?!

FRANK: They're waiting for identification—Long Island, Babylon.

EDDIE: [Moving to Frank] What are you handing me?! [Eddie, suddenly knowing the truth, stops in his tracks. The telephone operator signals for the telephone to be replaced. The mechanical clicks call Frank to attention; he slowly replaces the instrument]

MOODY: I don't believe that! Do you hear me? I don't believe it—

FRANK: What waste! . . . MOODY: It's a goddam lie!!

MR. BONAPARTE: What have-a you expect? . . .

MOODY: [Suddenly weeping] Lorna!

MR. BONAPARTE: [Standing, his head high] Joe. . . . Come, we bring-a him home . . . where he belong. . . .

SLOW FADEOUT

Lillian Hellman

(1905----)

In the early nineteen-thirties, a period of general dislocation in the United States, there was considerable distress in the theatre because no new playwrights of consequence were emerging. Fortunately, this situation began to change, the first sign of improvement being the appearance in 1934 of a powerful psychological drama by a hitherto active but uncelebrated young woman. The play was The Children's Hour. The author was Lillian Hellman, almost every one of whose efforts was to startle playgoers into an awareness of her talent.

Lillian Hellman was born in New Orleans to a shoe merchant who had migrated to Louisiana. Her birth in the South does not, however, align her with the regional writers of America who have made distinguished contributions to letters. Miss Hellman's parents moved to New York when she was five years old, and she is a metropolitan product in all respects but the accident of birth. Except for visiting relatives in the deep South during summer vacations, she grew up and was educated in the city, attending New York and Columbia Universities.

After graduation from college in 1924, Miss Hellman made inroads into the literary and theatrical world from many directions. She worked for a publisher, reviewed books for the New York Herald Tribune, published stories and articles, read plays for stage producers, and acted as a press agent for the theatre. In 1930, she went to Hollywood as a script reader, or "story analyst," acquiring more preparation for the stage and the screen. In 1932, on returning to New York, she began working as a play reader for Herman Shumlin, a meticulous and clear-headed New York producer and director. It was at this time that she read a famous early-nineteenthcentury Scottish law report, "The Great Drumsheugh Case." Having already developed a taste for playwriting by collaborating on a farce with Louis Kronenberger, she proceeded to dramatize this lawsuit, although advised against it by her employer. Changing the background to a small Connecticut town and creating full-sized characters, she wrote an impressive original play, The Children's Hour. Shumlin produced and directed it, and it ran for 691 performances in New York. It also toured widely, attracting much attention and running into difficulties in Boston and Chicago because its story of a fiendish child's machinations against two schoolteachers involved the subject of sexual abnormality.

As a partisan of labor, Miss Hellman next wrote Days to Come, a somewhat muddled treatment of the demoralizing effect of a labor conflict on a manufacturer who reluctantly hires strikebreakers. Produced in 1936, Days to Come revealed new evidence of Miss Hellman's vigor, although the play was quickly withdrawn from Broadway. Later that year, the author used her royalties from The Children's Hour to widen her knowledge of the contemporary scene by traveling to Russia, France, and Spain. In Spain, she witnessed the Civil War, experienced bombardment, and was profoundly stirred by the conflict. Her sympathies entirely on the side of the Loyalist Republicans, she came back to the United States in a combative frame of mind and henceforth gave vigorous support to all efforts to check the rise of fascism. She became a radical in politics and was outspoken in her approach to social problems.

Nevertheless, Miss Hellman's convictions did not lead her to write the kind of political harangues that flavored the playwriting of the radical wing in the theatre. Although her animus was plain enough in her next play, The Little Foxes (1939), her procedure was analytical and aloof in this story of unscrupulous roguery associated with the rise of industrial fortunes on the ruins of the old South. Emotion did flare in her work when she turned to the subject of resistance against German fascism, in Watch on the Rhine. This play was produced in 1941, when the Second World War was in full swing and when it was only a matter of months before the United States would become embroiled. Melodramatic in action but conceived with much humanity, Watch on the Rhine instantly won acclaim. It was considered beyond doubt the best of the anti-Nazi plays written for the American stage. Miss Hellman followed this exciting drama with a panoramic investigation of the errors that had brought us into the war. This inquisition, suitably entitled The Searching Wind, appeared in 1944, when the fortunes of war still hung in the balance. Snarled somewhat by a love plot, the chronicle recapitulated our appeasement of fascism in its early stages. Still in a prosecuting frame of mind in 1946, Miss Hellman exhumed the villains of The Little Foxes and wrote a second satire on acquisitiveness, Another Part of the Forest. Her last play, at the midpoint of the century of social conflict, was an adaptation from the French, Montserrat, in which an idealist faces the necessity of sending innocent people to their death in order to save the cause of freedom in South

Miss Hellman acquired a formidable reputation as a moralist, a strong hater, and a driving dramatist who never lost control of a situation or an argument. To critics who found her dramaturgy altogether too melodramatic and violent she could offer the partial defense that there was evil in the world and that it was her business to expose it. Never having much use for bumbling, she did not propose to write panegyrics on good intentions, and she showed no inclination to wallow in congenial but futile sentiment. Critics who found her mode of attack quite rasping sometimes voiced the suspicion that Miss Hellman simply did not like people. This was, however, an indictment easily dismissed on the evidence of the plays. The young Birdie in Another Part of the Forest and the middle-aged wreck of Birdie in The Little Foxes. Regina's husband and daughter in the latter play, and all but one of the major characters in Watch on the Rhine were conceived with sympathy and understanding.

Although Miss Hellman never overlooked the social framework within which her subjects functioned, characterization was primary in her procedure as a playwright. She worked slowly and tried to develop a full life for her characters in the ample notes she collected before writing each of her plays. If her stage pieces generally fall into the allegedly outmoded category of the well-made play, they are "well made" with the substance of reality, which consists of people as well as of situations and ideas. If they do not give us much of the wayward flow and happy surprise of writings which convey the "feel" of life more than they demonstrate a point, Miss Hellman's plays also avoid the amorphousness of this kind of "organic" or "protoplasmic" kind of composition. In any case, it must be conceded that, although Miss Hellman forced her dramatic action a little too much, piling evil upon evil and grief upon grief, she carried on the tradition of Ibsen and the social realists with due consideration for both the logic of character and the logic of situations.

The Little Foxes, considered the strongest and most closely knit of Miss Hellman's plays, is also her most interesting contribution to the modern theatre. Its obvious virtues of compactness and firmly drawn characterization are supported by a crackling style. And here her indictment of the predatory life leaves room for an understanding attitude toward those who are broken by it and those who try to resist it. The play exists, indeed, on many levels—as character drama, melodrama, and comedy. This is so decidedly the case that it is less easy than one would imagine to define the nature and ultimate effect of the play. It belongs to an intermediate genre of playwriting, troubling to precisians in criticism, that came into vogue in modern times with such dramatists as Ibsen, Strindberg, Becque (whose comedy The Vultures provides interesting possibilities for a comparison), and Shaw. For an equivalent type of writing in the older drama one may have to go back to the "dark comedies" of Shakespeare, although there is hardly a glimmer of poetry in Miss Hellman's work.

Much has also been made of the sociological aspects of The Little Foxes, such as the historical picture of the coming of industrialism to the South and the implication that the modern capitalistic world is full of Hubbards, great and small. Although these elements are certainly present, the argument against capitalism is actually peripheral to the story and not perfectly sustained. (One may wonder whether the Hubbards would not be Hubbards in any kind of society and whether modern big business does operate in the crude ways that the Hubbards favor. Then, too, Miss Hellman has included such capitalists as Regina's husband and William Marshall, who show no affinity for Regina's brothers. Miss Hellman concerns herself generally with damnation as a state of the soul, and a case might be made out for saying that her real theme, whether she knew it or not, is "original sin" in a modern context, which brings her closer to such contemporary Catholic writers as Mauriac than to Bernard Shaw or Karl Marx.) Ultimately, however, the most considered judgment on The Little Foxes will be that it is fundamentally an effective work for the stage. Within the strict confines of the theatre, the life in the play holds no insoluble questions and presents no ramifications requiring debate. It is in the theatrical completeness of this and other plays that Miss Hellman proves her mettle as a playwright.

SCENE: The living room of the Giddens house, a small town in the Deep South, the spring of 1900. Upstage is a staircase leading to the second story. U.R. are double doors to the dining room. When these doors are open we see a section of the dining room and the furniture. U.L. is an entrance hall with a coat-rack and umbrella stand. There are large lace-curtained windows on the L. wall. The room is lit by a center gas chandelier and painted china oil lamps on the tables. Against the wall is a large piano. D.R. are a high couch, a large table, several chairs. Against the L. backwall are a table and several chairs. Near the window there are a smaller couch and tables. The room is good-looking, the furniture expensive; but it reflects no particular taste. Everything is of the best, and that is all.

AT RISE: Addie, a tall, nice-looking Negro woman of about fifty-five, is closing the U.S. windows. From behind the closed dining-room doors there is the sound of voices. After a second Cal, a middle-aged Negro, comes in from the entrance L. hall, carrying a tray with 10 glasses and a bottle of port wine. Addie crosses, takes the tray from him, puts it on table, begins to arrange it.

ADDIE: [Pointing to the bottle] You gone stark out of your head?

CAL: No, smart lady, I ain't. Miss Regina told me to get out that bottle, [Points to bottle] that very bottle for the mighty honored guest. When Miss Regina changes orders like that you can bet your dime she got her reason.

ADDIE: [Points to dining room—not looking] Go on. You'll be needed. [She arranges glasses and pours wine]

CAL: [Looking at Addie while wiping glasses] Miss

Zan she had two helpings frozen fruit cream and she tell that honored guest, she tell him that you make the [Steps down to Addie] best frozen fruit cream in all the South.

ADDIE: [Smiles, pleased] Did she? Well, see that Belle saves a little for her. She like it right before she go to bed. Save a few little cakes, too, she

[The dining-room doors are opened and quickly closed again by Birdie Hubbard. Birdie is a woman of about forty, with a pretty, well-bred, faded face. Her movements are usually nervous and timid, but now, as she comes running into the room, she is gay and excited. Cal turns to-Birdie]

BIRDIE: Oh, Cal. [Closes door] I want you to get one of the kitchen boys to run home for me. He's to look in my desk drawer and——[Crosses D. to back of chair R.C. to Addie] My, Addie. What a good supper. Just as good as good can be.

ADDIE: You look pretty this evening, Miss Birdie, and young.

BIRDIE: [Laughing] Me, young? [Turns back to Call Maybe you better find Simon and tell him to do it himself. He's to look in my desk, the left drawer, and bring my music album right away. Mr. Marshall is very anxious to see it because of his father and the opera in Chicago. [To Addie] Mr. Marshall is such a polite man with his manners, and very educated and cultured, and I've told him all about how my Mama and Papa used to go to Europe for the music- [Laughs, To Addie] Imagine going all the way to Europe just to listen to music. Wouldn't that be nice, Addie? Just to sit there and listen and- [Turns and takes step to Cal] Left drawer, Cal. Tell him that twice because he forgets. And tell him not to let any of the things drop out of the album and to bring it right in here when he comes back.

[The dining-room doors are opened and quickly closed by Oscar Hubbard. He is a man in his late forties]

CAL: Yes'm. But Simon he won't get it right. [Crossing to door L.] But I'll tell him.

BIRDIE: Left drawer, Cal, and tell him to bring the blue book and——

OSCAR: [Sharply] Birdie.

BIRDIE: [Turning nervously] Oh, Oscar. I was just sending Simon for my music album.

OSCAR: [To Cal who has stopped at door L. to listen] Never mind about the album. Miss Birdie has changed her mind.

BIRDIE: But, really, Oscar. Really I promised Mr. Marshall. I——

oscar: Why do you leave the dinner table and go running about like a child?

[Addie crosses around sofa to D.S. window, closes windows]

BIRDIE: [Trying to be gay] But Oscar, Mr. Marshall said most specially he wanted to see my album. I told him about the time Mama met Wagner and Mrs. Wagner gave her the signed program and the big picture. [Oscar moves away D.C.] Mr. Marshall wants to see that. [Birdie moves to him] Very, very much. We had such a nice talk and——

OSCAR: [Taking step to her] You have been chattering to him like a magpie. You haven't let him be for a second. I can't think he came South to be bored with you. [He turns away, crosses D.R.]

BIRDIE: [Quickly, hurt] He wasn't bored. I don't believe he was bored. He's a very educated, cultured gentleman. [Her voice rises] I just don't believe it. [Addie moves up to back of sofa] You always talk like that when I'm having a nice time.

OSCAR: [Turning to her, sharply] You have had too much wine. Get yourself in hand now.

BIRDIE: [Drawing back, about to cry, shrilly] What am I doing? I am not doing anything. [Addie crosses U. back of sofa] What am I doing?

OSCAR: [Taking a step to her, tensely] I said get yourself in hand. Stop acting like a fool. [Addie crosses to U.S. windows, closes them]

BIRDIE: [Moves up, then turns to him, quietly] I don't believe he was bored. I just don't believe it. Some people like music and like to talk about it. [Leo enters from dining room. Regina in dining room rings bell] That's all I was doing.

[Leo Hubbard comes hurrying through the door. He is a young man of twenty, with a weak kind of good looks.]

LEO: Mama! [Birdie turns sharply to him] Papa. They are coming in now.

OSCAR: [Softly, stepping up to Birdie] Sit down, Birdie. Sit down now.

[Oscar crosses D.R. Leo crosses D.L. to piano. Birdie sits down in chair L.C., bows her head as if to hide her face. The dining-room doors are opened by Cal. We see people beginning to rise from the table. Regina Giddens comes in with William Marshall. Regina is a handsome woman of forty. Marshall is forty-five, pleasant looking, self-possessed. Behind them comes Alexandra Giddens, a very pretty, rather delicate looking girl of seventeen. She is followed by Benjamin Hubbard, fifty-five, with a large jovial face and the light graceful movements that one often finds in large men. Regina, after a sharp look at Birdie and Oscar, crosses to sofa R. Marshall crosses C. to chair R.C. Alexandra crosses D.L. to settee and sits]

Ι

REGINA: Mr. Marshall, I think you're trying to console me. Chicago may be the noisiest, dirtiest city in the world but I should still prefer it to the sound of our horses and the smell of our azaleas. I should like crowds of people, and theaters, and lovely women—— [Regina sits on sofa, smiles at Marshall and indicates for him to sit next to her] Very lovely women, Mr. Marshall? [Ben crosses to back of settee L.]

MARSHALL: [Crossing to sofa R.] In Chicago? Oh, I suppose so. But I can tell you this: I've never dined there with three such lovely ladies.

[He sits on sofa to R. of Regina. Addie comes down to table, takes bottle off tray and serves wine]

BEN: [Crossing to C. nods] Our Southern women are well favored.

LEO: [Stepping in, laughs] But one must go to Mobile for the ladies, sir. Very elegant worldly ladies, too.

[Addie is serving Regina, who hands a glass to Marshall, then takes one for herself]

BEN: [Looks at him very deliberately] Worldly, eh? Worldly, did you say?

[Addie serves Ben]

OSCAR: [Hastily, to Leo] Your Uncle Ben means that worldliness is not a mark of beauty in any woman.

LEO: [Steps up to above settee L. Quickly] Of course, Uncle Ben. I didn't mean——

[Ben cross R. to chair R.C., sits]

MARSHALL: Your port is excellent, Mrs. Giddens, [Addie serves Birdie, who catches Oscar's look at her, and refuses the drink]

REGINA: Thank you, Mr. Marshall. We had been saving that bottle, hoping we could open it just for you.

ALEXANDRA: [As Addie comes to her with tray] Oh. May I really, Addie?

ADDIE: Better ask Mama.

ALEXANDRA: May I, Mama?

REGINA: [Nods, smiles] In Mr. Marshall's honor. ALEXANDRA: [Smiles] Mr. Marshall, this will be the first taste of port I've ever had.

[Addie serves Leo]

MARSHALL: [Leaning forward] No one ever had their first taste of a better port. [He lifts his glass in a toast, she lifts hers, they both drink. Sits back.

Looks around the room, smiles. Addie crosses to Oscar U.R., serves him] Well, I suppose it is all true, Mrs. Giddens. [Oscar crosses D.R.]

REGINA: What is true?

[Addie crosses to table for bottle, takes the tray to table U.C., places it there, then exits L.]

MARSHALL: That you Southerners occupy a unique position in America. You live better than the rest of us, you eat better, you drink better. I wonder you find time, or want to find time, to do business.

BEN: [Laughs] A great many Southerners don't. MARSHALL: Do all of you live here together?

REGINA: Here with me? [Laughs] Oh, no. My brother Ben lives next door. My brother Oscar and his family live in the next square.

BEN: [Sitting forward] But we are a very close family. We've always wanted it that way.

MARSHALL: That is very pleasant. Keeping your family together to share each other's lives. My family moves around too much. My children seem never to come home. Away at school in the winter; in the summer, Europe with their mother——

[Ben sits back]

REGINA: [Eagerly] Oh, yes. Even down here we read about Mrs. Marshall in the society pages.

MARSHALL: I dare say. She moves about a great deal. And all of you are part of the same business? Hubbard Sons?

BEN: [Motions to Oscar] Oscar and me. [Motions to Regina] My sister's good husband is a banker.

MARSHALL: [Looks at Regina, surprised] Oh.

REGINA: I am so sorry that my husband isn't here to meet you. He's been very ill. He is at Johns Hopkins. But he will he home soon. We think he is getting better now.

LEO: [Crosses to above chair L.C.] I work for Uncle Horace, [Regina looks at him] I mean I work for Uncle Horace at his bank, I keep an eye on things while he's away.

REGINA: [Smiles] Really, Leo?

BEN: [Looks at him, then to Marshall] Modesty in the young is as excellent as it is rare. [Looks at Leo again]

OSCAR: [To Leo] Your Uncle means that a young man should speak more modestly.

LEO: [Hastily, taking a step to Ben] Oh, I didn't

MARSHALL: Oh, Mrs. Hubbard. Where's that Wagner autograph you promised to let me see? My train will be leaving soon and——

[Leo crosses U. to table U.C., pours himself a drink]

OSCAR: My wife is a miserable victim of head-aches. [Crosses U.R. to above sofa R.]

REGINA: [Quickly] Mr. Marshall said at supper that he would like you to play for him, Alexandra.

ALEXANDRA: [Who has been looking at Birdie] It's not I who play well, sir. It's my aunt. She plays just wonderfully. She's my teacher. [Rises; eagerly] May we play a duet? May we, Mama?

BIRDIE: [Taking Alexandra's hand] Thank you, dear. But I have my headache now. I—— oscar: [Sharply] Don't be stubborn, Birdie. Mr. Marshall wants you to play.

MARSHALL: Indeed I do. If your headache isn't----

BIRDIE: [Hesitates, then gets up, pleased] But I'd like to, sir. Very much.

[She and Alexandra go to piano. Alexandra brings chair from U.L. corner to piano for herself. Birdie moves stool D.S., then takes some music from top of piano. They talk about the music for a second, then study it. Oscar slowly crosses L. to chair L.C.]

MARSHALL: It's very remarkable how you Southern aristocrats have kept together. Kept together and kept what belonged to you.

BEN: You misunderstand, sir. Southern aristocrats have not kept together and have not kept what belonged to them.

MARSHALL: [Laughs, indicates room] You don't call this keeping what belongs to you?

[Oscar sits chair L.C.]

BEN: But we are not aristocrats. [Leo slowly crosses R. to D.R.—listening. Points to Birdie at piano] Our brother's wife is the only one of us who belongs to the Southern aristocracy.

[Birdie selects a book of music. She opens it as Alexandra sits down. She is stopped by "our brother's wife," looks toward Ben. Alexandra looks up at her]

MARSHALL: [Smiles] My information is that you people have been here, and solidly here, for a long time.

[Birdie turns back and goes through the pages] OSCAR: And so we have. Since our great-grand-father.

BEN: [Smiles] Who was not an aristocrat, like Birdie's.

MARSHALL: [A little sharply] You make great distinctions.

[Birdie has found the page, and looks up again on "like Birdie's." Alexandra turns head a little to them. Birdie turns back to music. Leo is D.R.]

BEN: Oh, they have been made for us. And maybe they are important distinctions. [Leans forward, intimately] Now you take Birdie's family. When my great-grandfather came here they were the highest tone plantation owners in this state.

[Birdie looks at them. Alexandra looks back to her, takes her hand, pats it]

LEO; [Steps to Marshall. Proudly] My mother's grandfather was governor of the state before the war

[Birdie turns back to Alexandra]

OSCAR: They owned the plantation, Lionnet. You may have heard of it, sir?

MARSHALL: [Laughs] No, I've never heard of anything but brick houses on a lake, and cotton mills.

BEN: Lionnet in its day was the best cotton land in the South. It still brings us in a fair crop. [Sits back] Ah, they were great days for those people—even when I can remember. They had the best of everything. [Birdie turns to them] Cloth from Paris, trips to Europe, horses you can't raise any more, niggers to lift their fingers—

BIRDIE: [Suddenly] We were good to our people. Everybody knew that. We were better to them than——

[Marshall looks up at Birdie]

REGINA: [A quick look at Marshall, then to Birdie] Why, Birdie, You aren't playing.

[Marshall has been looking curiously at Birdie] BEN: But when the war comes these fine gentlemen ride off and leave the cotton, and the women, to rot.

BIRDIE: My father was killed in the war. He was a fine soldier, Mr. Marshall. A fine man.

REGINA: Oh, certainly, Birdie. A famous soldier. BEN: [To Birdie] But that isn't the tale I am telling Mr. Marshall. [To Marshall] Well, sir, the war ends. [Birdie goes back to piano, puts down music, sits and is ready to play] Lionnet is almost ruined, and the sons finish ruining it. And there were thousands like them. Why? [Leans forward] Because the Southern aristocrat can adapt himself to nothing. Too high-toned to try.

MARSHALL: Sometimes it is difficult to learn new ways.

[Birdie and Alexandra begin to play. Marshall leans forward, listening]

BEN: Perhaps, perhaps. [All listen to music. He sees that Marshall is paying attention to music. Irritated, he turns to Birdie and Alexandra at piano, then back to Marshall] You're right, Mr. Marshall. It is difficult to learn new ways. But maybe that's why it's profitable. Our grandfather and our father learned the new ways and learned how to make them pay. They work. [Smiles nastily] They are in trade. Hubbard Sons, Merchandise. Others, Birdie's family for example, look down on them. [Settles back in chair] To make a long story short, Lionnet now belongs to us. [Birdie stops playing and turns to them] Twenty years ago we took over their land, their cotton, and their daughter.

[Birdie rises and stands stiffly by piano. Marshall, who has been watching her, rises]

MARSHALL: May I bring you a glass of port, Mrs. Hubbard?

BIRDIE: [Softly] No thank you, sir. You are most polite.

[She turns away and sits. Alexandra tries to soothe her and asks her to play again. She pantomimes that she cannot, and for Alexandra to play alone]

REGINA: [Sharply, to Ben] You are boring Mr. Marshall with these ancient family tales.

BEN: I hope not. I hope not. I am trying to make an important point—— [Bows to Marshall] for our future business partner.

[Marshall sits]

OSCAR: [To Marshall] My brother always says that it's folks like us who have struggled and fought to bring to our land some of the prosperity of your land.

BEN: Some people call that patriotism.

REGINA: [Laughs gaily] I hope you don't find my brothers too obvious, Mr. Marshall. I'm afraid they mean that this is the time for the ladies to leave the gentlemen to talk business.

MARSHALL: [Hastily] Not at all. We settled everything this afternoon. [Alexandra starts to play, alone. Marshall looks at his watch] I have only a few minutes before I must leave for the train. [Smiles at her] And I insist they be spent with you.

REGINA: And with another glass of port.

MARSHALL: Thank you.

[Regina looks at him, smiles, gets up, takes his glass and crosses to table U.C. Marshall rises when she does, then sits]

BEN: [To Regina as she passes him] My sister is right. [To Marshall] I am a plain man and I am trying to say a plain thing. [Sitting forward] A man ain't only in business for what he can get out of it. It's got to give him something here. [Puts hand to his breast. Regina pours Marshall's drink] That's every bit as true for the nigger picking cotton for a silver quarter, as it is for you and me. [Regina hands Marshall glass, then sits] If it don't give him something here, then he don't pick the cotton right. [Sits back. Regina crosses D. to sofa] Money isn't all. Not by three shots.

MARSHALL: Really? Well, I always thought it was a great deal. [Drinks]

REGINA: And so did I, Mr. Marshall.

MARSHALL: [Leans forward. Pleasantly, but with meaning] Now you don't have to convince me that you are the right people for the deal. I wouldn't be here if you hadn't convinced me six months ago. You want the mill here, and I want it here. It isn't my business to find out why you want it.

BEN: To bring the machine to the cotton, and not the cotton to the machine.

MARSHALL: [Amused] You have a turn for neat phrases, Hubbard. Well, however grand your reasons are, mine are simple: [Leo crosses u.c. to table—pours drink] I want to make money and I believe I'll make it on you. [As Ben starts to speak, he smiles] Mind you, I have no objections to more high minded reasons. They are mighty valuable in business. It's fine to have partners who so closely follow the teachings of Christ. [Gets up] And now I must leave for my train.

[Puts his glass on table. All except Birdie rise. Alexandra stops playing]

REGINA: I'm sorry you won't stay over with us, Mr. Marshall, but you'll come again, any time you like.

BEN: [Motions to Leo, indicating bottle] Fill them up, boy, fill them up. [Leo moves around, filling glasses as Ben speaks] Down here, sir, we have a strange custom. We drink the last drink for a toast. That's to prove that the Southerner is always still on his feet for the last drink. [Picks up his glass] It was Henry Frick, your Mr. Henry Frick, who said, "Railroads are the Rembrandts of investments." Well, I say "Southern cotton mills will be the Rembrandts of investments." So I give you the firm of Hubbard Sons and Marshall, Cotton Mills, and to it a long and prosperous life.

[They all pick up their glasses. Marshall looks at them, amused. Then he, too, lifts his glass, smiles]

OSCAR: The children will drive you to the depot. [Crosses to table U.C.—puts down glass] Leo! Alexandra! You will drive Mr. Marshall down.

LEO: [Eagerly, looks at Ben who nods] Yes, sir. [To Marshall] Not often Uncle Ben lets me drive the horses. And a beautiful pair they are. [Starts for hall] Come on Zan. [Exits]

ALEXANDRA: [Crosses to Ben] May I drive tonight, Uncle Ben, please? I'd like to and——

BEN: [Shakes his head, laughs] In your evening clothes? Oh, no, my dear.

ALEXANDRA: But Leo, always-

[Stops, exits quickly]

REGINA: I don't like to say goodbye to you, Mr. Marshall.

MARSHALL: Then we won't say goodbye. You have promised that you would come and let me show you Chicago. Do I have to make you promise again?

REGINA: [Looks at him as he presses her hand] I promise again.

[Ben crosses to hall]

MARSHALL: [Touches her hand again, then moves to Birdie] Goodbye, Mrs. Hubbard.

[Birdie rises, crosses c.]

BIRDIE: [Shyly, with sweetness and dignity] Good-bye. sir.

[He bows, starts toward entrance hall. Regina crosses to C.]

MARSHALL: [As he passes Regina] Remember.

regina: I will.

OSCAR: We'll see you to the carriage.

[Marshall exits followed by Oscar. For a second Regina and Birdie stand looking after them. Then Regina throws up her arms, laughs happily]

REGINA: And there, Birdie, goes the man who has opened the door to our future.

BIRDIE: [Surprised at the unaccustomed friendliness] What?

989

REGINA: [Turning to her] Our future. Yours and mine, Ben's and Oscar's, the children's——[Looks at Birdie's puzzled face, laughs] Our future! [After a second crosses D.L. to Birdie] You were charming at supper, Birdie. Mr. Marshall certainly thought so.

BIRDIE: [Pleased] Why, Regina. Do you think he did?

REGINA: Can't you tell when you're being admired?

BIRDIE: Oscar said I bored Mr. Marshall. [Then quietly] But he admired you. He told me so.

REGINA: What did he say?

BIRDIE: He said to me, "I hope your sister-in-law will come to Chicago. Chicago will be at her feet." He said the ladies would bow to your manner and the gentlemen to your looks.

REGINA: [Crossing R. to sofa] Did he? He seems a lonely man. Imagine being lonely with all that money. I don't think he likes his wife.

BIRDIE: Not like his wife? What a thing to say.

REGINA: [Sits sofa R.] She's away a great deal. He said that several times. And once he made fun of her being so social and hightoned. But that fits in all right. [Sits back, arms on back of sofa, stretches] Her being social, I mean. She can introduce me. It won't take long with an introduction from her.

BIRDIE: [Bewildered] Introduce you? In Chicago? You mean you really might go? [Crosses R. to table] Oh, Regina, you can't leave here. What about Horace?

REGINA: Don't look so scared about everything, Birdie. I'm going to live in Chicago. I've always wanted to. And now there'll be plenty of money to go with.

BIRDIE: [Sits chair R.C.] But Horace won't be able to move around. You know what the doctor wrote.

REGINA: There'll be millions, Birdie, millions. You know what I've always said when people told me we were rich? I said I think you should either be a nigger or a millionaire. In between, like us, what for? [Laughs. Looks at Birdie] But I'm not going away tomorrow, Birdie. [Takes her arms down] There's plenty of time to worry about Horace when he comes home. If he ever decides to come home.

BIRDIE: Will we be going to Chicago? I mean, Oscar and Leo and me?

REGINA: You? I shouldn't think so. [Laughs. Leaning forward] Well, we must remember tonight. It's a very important night and we mustn't forget it. We shall plan all the things we'd like to have and then we'll really have them. Make a wish, Birdie, any wish. It's bound to come true now.

[Ben and Oscar enter]

BIRDIE: [Laughs] Well. Well, I don't know. Maybe. [Regina turns to look at Ben] Well, I guess I'd know right off what I wanted,

[Ben crosses to above Regina. Oscar stands by the upper window, waves to the departing carriage?

REGINA: [Looks up at Ben, smiles. He smiles back at her] Well, you did it. [Grasps his hand]

BEN: Looks like it might be we did.

REGINA: [Springs up, laughs] Looks like it! Don't pretend. [Rises, crossing u.c.] You're like a cat who's been licking the cream. [Crosses to wine bottle on table u.c.] Now we must all have a drink to celebrate.

[Ben crosses to table U.C.]

OSCAR: [From window] The children, Alexandra and Leo, make a very handsome couple, Regina. [Regina does not look at him. Ben and Regina drink. Oscar steps in] Marshall remarked himself what fine young folks they were. How well they looked together.

REGINA: [Sharply] Yes. You said that before, Oscar. [She puts drink down, crosses D. to chair L.C.—sits]

BEN: Yes, sir. [Crossing D.R.] It's beginning to look as if the deal's all set. I may not be a subtle man—but——[Turns to them. After a second] Now somebody ask me how I know the deal is set.

oscar: What do you mean, Ben?

BEN: You remember I told him that down here we drink the last drink for a toast?

OSCAR: [Thoughtfully] Yes. I never heard that before.

BEN: Nobody's ever heard it before. [Turns chair D.R. to face room. Stands in front of it] God forgives those who invent what they need. [Holding up his glass] I already had his signature. But we've all done business with men whose word over a glass is better than a bond. Anyway it don't hurt to have both. [He sits]

OSCAR: [Turns to Regina. Crosses L. to above sofa] You understand what Ben means?

REGINA: [Smiles] Yes, Oscar. I understand. I understood immediately.

BEN: [Looks at her admiringly] Did you, Regina? Well, when he lifted his glass to drink, I closed my eyes and saw the bricks going into place.

REGINA: And I saw a lot more than that. [Oscar sits sofa R., lights cigar, sits back to relax]

BEN: Slowly, slowly. As yet we have only our hopes.

REGINA: Birdie and I have just been planning what we want. I know what I want. What will you want, Ben?

BEN: Caution. Don't count the chickens. [Leans back, laughs. Regina laughs] Well, God would allow us a little day dreaming. Good for the soul when you've worked hard enough to deserve it. [Pauses] I think I'll have a stable. For a long time I've had my good eye on Carter's in Savannah. A rich man's pleasure, the sport of kings, why not the sport of Hubbards? Why not?

REGINA: [Smiles] Why not? What will you have, Oscar?

oscar: I don't know. [Thoughtfully—leaning forward on table] The pleasure of seeing the bricks grow will be enough for me.

I

BEN: Oh, of course. Our greatest pleasure will be to see the bricks grow. But we are all entitled to a little side indulgence.

OSCAR: [Looking front] Yes, I suppose so. Well, then, I think we might take a few trips here and there, [To Birdie] eh, Birdie?

BIRDIE: [Surprised at being consulted] Yes, Oscar. I'd like that.

oscan: [Looking front] We might even make a regular trip to Jekyll Island. I've heard the Cornelly place is for sale. We might think about buying it. Make a nice change. [To Birdie] Do you good, Birdie, a change of climate. [Front] Fine shooting, on Jekyll, the best.

BIRDIE: I'd like-

OSCAR: [Indulgently—front] What would you like? BIRDIE: Two things. Two things I'd like most.

REGINA: Two! I should like a thousand. You are modest, Birdie.

BIRDIE: [Warmly, delighted with the unexpected interest] I should like to have Lionnet back. I know you own it now, but I'd like to see it fixed up again, the way Mama and Papa had it. Every year it used to get a nice coat of paint—Papa was very particular about the paint—and the lawn was so smooth all the way down to the river, with the trims of zinnias and red-feather plush. And the figs and blue little plums and the scuppernongs—[Smiles. Turns to Regina] The organ is still there and it wouldn't cost much to fix. We could have parties for Zan, [rises, crosses to Regina] the way Mama used to have for me. [Crosses U.C., moving about, dreamily]

BEN: That's a pretty picture, Birdie. Might be a most pleasant way to live. [Dismissing Birdie] What do you want, Regina?

BIRDIE: [Very happily, not noticing that they are no longer listening to her; crosses D.S.] I could have a cutting garden. Just where Mama's used to be. Oh, I do think we could be happier there. Papa used to say that nobody had ever lost their temper at Lionnet, and nobody ever would. Papa would never let anybody be nasty spoken, or mean. No, sir. [Moving about U.C.] He just didn't like it.

BEN: What do you want, Regina?

REGINA: I'm going to Chicago. And when I'm settled there and know the right people and the right things to buy—because I certainly don't now—I shall go to Paris and buy them. [Laughs] I'm going to leave you and Oscar to count the bricks.

BIRDIE: [Turning to Oscar, crosses to chair R.C.] Oscar. Please let me have Lionnet back.

oscar: [To Regina] You are serious about moving to Chicago?

[Birdie crosses U. to table U.C., pours drink, drinks it fast]

BEN: She is going to see the great world and leave us in the little one. Well, we'll come and visit you and meet all the great and be proud to think you are our sister.

REGINA: [Gaily] Certainly. And you won't even have to learn to be subtle, Ben. Stay as you are. You will be rich and the rich don't have to be subtle.

oscan: But what about Alexandra? She's seventeen. Old enough to be thinking about marrying.

BIRDIE: [Crosses D. to Oscar] And, Oscar, I have one more wish. Just one more wish.

oscar: [Turns] What is it, Birdie? What are you saying?

BIRDIE: I want you to stop shooting. I mean, so much. I don't like to see animals and birds killed just for the killing. You only throw them away——

BEN: [To Regina] It'll take a great deal of money to live as you're planning, Regina.

REGINA: Certainly. But there'll be plenty of money. You have estimated the profits very high.

BEN: I have-

BIRDIE: [Does not notice that Oscar is looking at her furiously] And you never let anybody else shoot, and the niggers need it so much to keep from starving. It's wicked to shoot food just because you like to shoot, when poor people need it so——

BEN: [Laughs] I have estimated the profits very high—for myself.

REGINA: What did you say?

BIRDIE: I've always wanted to speak about it, Oscar.

OSCAR: [Slowly, carefully] What are you chattering about?

BIRDIE: [Finally catches his tone, nervously] I was talking about Lionnet and—and about your shooting—— oscar: You are exciting yourself.

REGINA: [To Ben] I didn't hear you. There was so much talking.

OSCAR: [To Birdie] You have been acting very childish, very excited, all evening.

BIRDIE: Regina asked me what I'd like-

REGINA: What did you say, Ben?

BIRDIE: ——now that we'll be so rich. Everybody was saying what they would like, so I said what I would like, too.

BEN: I said——[He is interrupted by Oscar]

OSCAR: [To Birdie] Very well. We've all heard you. That's enough now.

BEN: I am waiting! [They stop. Irritated, to Oscar] I am waiting for you to finish. You and Birdie. Four conversations are three too many. [Birdie crosses u.c. slowly, sits chair R. of table. Oscar nods, Ben waits, sees that everything is quiet. Smiles, to Regina] I said that I had, and I do, estimate the profits very high—for myself, and Oscar, of course.

REGINA: [Slowly] And what does that mean? [Ben shrugs, looks toward Oscar] oscar: [Looks at Ben, clears throat] Well, Regina, it's like this. For forty-nine per cent Marshall will put up four hundred thousand dollars. For fifty-one per cent— [Smiles archly] a controlling interest, mind you, we will put up two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars besides offering him certain benefits that our [Looks at Ben to include him] local position allows us to manage. Ben means that two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars is a lot of money.

REGINA: I know the terms and I know it's a lot of money.

BEN: [Nodding] It is.

OSCAR: Ben means that we are ready with our two-thirds of the money. Your third, Horace's, I mean, doesn't seem to be ready. [Raises his hand as Regina starts to speak] Ben has written to Horace, I have written, and you have written. He answers. But he never mentions this business. Yet we have explained it to him in great detail, and told him the urgency. Still he never mentions it. Ben has been very patient, Regina. [Sits back] Naturally, you are our sister and we want you to benefit from anything we do. [Looks at Ben]

REGINA: [Rises. To Oscar] And in addition to your concern for me, you do not want control to go out of the family. [To Ben] That right, Ben?

BEN: That's cynical. [Smiles] Cynicism is only an unpleasant way of saying the truth.

OSCAR: [Rises. Crosses L. to C.] No need to be cynical. We'd have no trouble raising the third share, the share that you want to take.

REGINA: I am sure you could get the third share, the share you were saving for me. But that would give you a strange partner. [Crosses R. to sofa] And strange partners sometimes want a great deal. [Smiles unpleasantly] But perhaps it would be wise for you to find him.

oscan: [Turns, step c.] Now, now. Nobody says we want to do that. We would like to have you in and you would like to come in.

REGINA: Yes. I certainly would.

BEN: [Laughs, puts up his hand] But we haven't heard from Horace.

REGINA: I've given my word that Horace will put up the money. That should be enough.

[Oscar crosses to table D.L.—flicks ash off cigar]

BEN: Oh, it was enough. I took your word. But I've got to have more than your word now. The contracts will be signed this week, and Marshall will want to see our money soon after. Regina, Horace has been in Baltimore for five months. I know that you've written him to come home, and that he hasn't come.

OSCAR: It's beginning to look as if he doesn't want to come home.

REGINA: Of course he wants to come home. [Crossing c.] You can't move around with heart trouble at any moment you choose. You know what doctors are like once they get their hands on a case like this——

OSCAR: They can't very well keep him from answering letters, can they? [Regina turns to Ben] They couldn't keep him from arranging for the money if he wanted to-

REGINA: [Crossing R.] Has it occurred to you that Horace is also a good business man?

BEN: Certainly. He is a shrewd trader. Always has been. The bank is proof of that.

REGINA: Then, possibly, he may be keeping silent because he doesn't think he is getting enough for his money. [Looks at Oscar] Seventy-five thousand he has to put up. That's a lot of money, too. [Sits sofa]

OSCAR: Nonsense. He knows a good thing when he hears it. [Crosses R. to table] He knows that we can make twice the profit on cotton goods manufactured here than can be made in the North.

BEN: That isn't what Regina means. [Smiles] May I interpret you, Regina? [To Oscar] Regina is saying that Horace wants more than a third of our share.

OSCAR: [Amazed, playing along] But he's only putting up a third of the money. You put up a third and you get a third. What else could he expect?

. REGINA: Well, I don't know. I don't know about these things. It would seem that if you put up a third you should only get a third. But then again, there's no law about it, is there? [Oscar turns-crosses to chair L.C.] I should think that if you knew your money was very badly needed, well, you just might say, I want more, I want a bigger share. [Oscar turns -crosses u. back of sofa L.] You boys have done that. I've heard you say so.

BEN: [After a pause, laughs] So you believe he has deliberately held out? [Oscar crosses D. to chair L.C.] For a larger share? [Leaning forward] Well, I don't believe it. But I do believe that's what you want. Am I right, Regina?

REGINA: Oh, I shouldn't like to be too definite. [Oscar sits chair L.C. To Ben] But I could say that I wouldn't like to persuade Horace unless he did get a larger share. I must look after his interests. It seems only natural-

OSCAR: And where would the larger share come from?

REGINA: I don't know. That's not my business. [Giggles] But perhaps it could come off your share,

[Regina and Ben laugh]

OSCAR: [Rises and wheels furiously on both of them as they laugh] What kind of talk is this?

BEN: I haven't said a thing.

OSCAR: [Crosses to table R. To Regina] You are talking very big tonight.

REGINA: [Stops laughing] Am 1? Well, you should know me well enough to know that I wouldn't be asking for things I didn't think I could get.

oscar: Listen. I don't believe you can even get Horace to come home, much less get money from him or talk quite so big about what you want.

REGINA: Oh, I can get him home. OSCAR: Then why haven't you?

REGINA: I thought I should fight his battles for him, before he came home. Horace is a very sick man. And even if you don't care how sick he is. I do.

BEN: Stop this foolish squabbling. [Oscar turns. crosses L.C.] How can you get him home?

REGINA: I will send Alexandra to Baltimore. She will ask him to come home. She will say that she wants him to come home, and that I want him to come home.

BIRDIE: [Suddenly] Well, of course she wants him here, but he's sick and maybe he's happy where he

REGINA: [As if she had not heard Birdie, to Ben] You agree that he will come home if she asks him to, if she says that I miss him and want him-

BEN: [Looks at her, smiles] I admire you, Regina. And I agree. That's settled now, and—[Starts to rise

REGINA: [Quickly stopping him] But before she brings him home, I want to know what he's going to get.

BEN: What do you want?

REGINA: Twice what you offered.

BEN: Well, you won't get it.

oscar: [To Regina] I think you've gone crazy.

REGINA: I don't want to fight, Ben-

BEN: I don't either. You won't get it. There isn't any chance of that. [Roguishly] You're holding us up, and that's not pretty, Regina, not pretty. [Holds up his hand as he sees she is about to speak] But we need you, and I don't want to fight. Here's what I'll do: I'll give Horace forty per cent, instead of the thirty-three and a third he really should get. I'll do that provided he is home and his money is up within two weeks. How's that?

REGINA: All right.

OSCAR: [Crossing c. to Ben] I've asked before: Where is this extra share coming from?

BEN: [Pleasantly] From you. From your share.

OSCAR: [Furiously. Crosses R. to table R.] From me, is it? That's just fine and dandy. That's my reward. For thirty-five years I've worked my hands to the bone for you. For thirty-five years I've done all the things you didn't want to do. And this is what

BEN: [Turns slowly to look at Oscar. Oscar breaks off] My, my. I am being attacked tonight on all sides. First by my sister, then by my brother. And I ain't a man who likes being attacked. I can't believe that God wants the strong to parade their strength, but I don't mind doing it, if it's got to be done. [Oscar turns, crosses to above chair L.C., facing L. Leans back in his chair] You ought to take these things better, Oscar. I've made you money in the past. I'm going to make you more money now. You'll be a very rich man. What's the difference to any of us if a little more goes here, a little less goes thereit's all in the family. And it will stay in the family. [Addie enters, begins to gather the glasses from table U.C. Oscar turns to Ben] So my money will go to Alexandra and Leo. They may even marry some day and——

[Addie looks at Ben, then crosses to table R., picks up glasses, then crosses to table U.C., picks up tray and exits L.]

BIRDIE: [Rising] Marry—Zan and Leo-

OSCAR: [Carefully—crossing D. to chair L.C.] That would make a great difference in my feelings. If they married. [Sits chair L.C. Birdie sits chair U.C.]

BEN: Yes, that's what I mean. Of course it would make a difference.

OSCAR: [Carefully] Is that what you mean, Regina? REGINA: Oh, it's too far away. We'll talk about it in a few years.

oscar: I want to talk about it now.

BEN: [Nods] Naturally.

REGINA: There's a lot of things to consider. They are first cousins, and—— oscar: That isn't unusual. Our grandmother and grandfather were first cousins.

REGINA: [Giggles] And look at us.

[Ben giggles]

oscar: [Angrily—rises, crosses D.L.] You're both being very gay with my money.

[Oscar pacing front piano]

BEN: [Sighs] These quarrels. I dislike them so. [Leans forward to Regina. Oscar stops walking at table L. Listens] A marriage might be a very wise arrangement, for several reasons. And then, Oscar has given up something for you. You should try to manage something for him.

REGINA: I haven't said I was opposed to it. But Leo is a wild boy. There were those times when he took a little money from the bank and——

OSCAR: [A step in] That's all past history—

REGINA: Oh, I know. And I know all young men are wild. I'm only mentioning it to show you that there are considerations——

BEN: [Irritated that she does not understand he is trying to keep Oscar quiet] All right, so there are. But please assure Oscar that you will think about it very seriously.

REGINA: [Smiles, nods] Very well. I assure Oscar that I will think about it seriously.

OSCAR: [Sharply] That is not an answer.

REGINA: My, [Rises] you're in a bad humor and you shall put me in one. [Crossing to c.] I have said all that I am willing to say now. After all, Horace has to give his consent, too.

OSCAR: Horace will do what you tell him to.

REGINA: Yes, I think he will.

oscar: [A step to her] And I have your word that you will try to——

REGINA: [Patiently. Crosses to him] Yes, Oscar. You have my word that I will think about it. Now do leave me alone.

[There is the sound of Alexandra and Leo opening and closing the front door]

BIRDIE: [Rising] I—Alexandra is only seventeen.

REGINA: [Calling. Crossing in to hall] Alexandra? Are you back? [Birdie sits]

ALEXANDRA: Yes, Mama.

LEO: [Comes into room. Crossing D.L.] Mr. Marshall got off safe and sound. Weren't those fine clothes he had? You can always spot clothes made in a good place. Look like maybe they were done in England. [Regina and Alexandra enter noom] Lots of men in the North send all the way to England for their stuff.

BEN: [To Leo] Were you careful diving the horses?

LEO: [Turns to Ben] Oh, yes sir. I was.

[Alexandra has come in on Ben's question, hears the answer, looks angrily at Leo]

ALEXANDRA: [Crosses to Birdie] It's a lovely night. You should have come, Aunt Birdie.

REGINA: Were you gracious to Mr. Marshall?

ALEXANDRA: I think so, Mama. I liked him. [Leo crosses to settee L.—sits]

REGINA: Good. And now I have great news for you. [Addie enters L. with tray with water pitcher and glasses. Crosses to table U.C. Alexandra crosses to Regina] You are going to Baltimore in the morning to bring your father home.

ALEXANDRA: [Gasps, then delighted] Me? Papa said I should come? That must mean—[Turns to Addie] Addie, he must be well. [Crosses to Addie] Think of it, he'll be back home again. We'll bring him home.

REGINA: You are going alone, Alexandra. [Sits sofa R.]

ADDIE: [Alexandra has turned in surprise] Going alone? Going by herself? [Crosses to above table R.] A child that age! Mr. Horace ain't going to like Zan traipsing up there by herself.

REGINA: [Sharply] Go upstairs and lay out Alexandra's things.

ADDIE: He'd expect me to be along-

REGINA: I'll be up in a few minutes to tell you what to pack. [Addie slowly begins to climb steps. To Alexandra] I should think you'd like going alone. At your age it certainly would have delighted me. You're a strange girl, Alexandra. Addie has babied you so much.

ALEXANDRA: I only thought it would be more fun if Addie and I went together.

BIRDIE: [Timidly] Maybe I could go with her, Regina. I'd really like to.

REGINA: She is going alone. She is getting old enough to take some responsibilities.

OSCAR: She'd better learn now. She's almost old enough to get married. [Jovially, to Leo, slapping him on shoulder] Eh, son?

LEO: Huh?

OSCAR: [Annoyed with Leo for not understanding]
Old enough to get married, you're thinking, eh?
LEO: Oh, yes, sir. [Feebly] Lots of girls get married at Zan's age. Look at Mary Prester and Johanna and-

REGINA: Well, she's not getting married tomorrow. But she is going to Baltimore tomorrow, so let's talk about that. [Oscar turns away—crosses U.L. To Alexandra] You'll be glad to have Papa home again.

ALEXANDRA: I wanted to go before, Mama. You remember that. [Crosses R.C.] But you said you couldn't go, and that I couldn't go alone.

REGINA: I've changed my mind. [Too casually] You're to tell Papa how much you missed him, and that he must come home now—for your sake. Tell him that you need him home.

ALEXANDRA: [Crosses to above table R.] Need him home? I don't understand.

REGINA: There is nothing for you to understand. You are simply to say what I have told you.

BIRDIE: [Rises, a step D. to Regina] He may be too sick. She couldn't do that——

ALEXANDRA: Yes. He may be too sick to travel. I couldn't make him think he had to come home for me, if he is too sick to——

REGINA: [Looks at her, sharply, challengingly] You couldn't do what I tell you to do, Alexandra?

ALEXANDRA: [Looks at her quietly] No. I couldn't. If I thought it would hurt him.

REGINA: [After a second's silence, smiles pleasantly] But you are doing this for Papa's own good. [Takes Alexandra's hand] You must let me be the judge of his condition. It's the best possible cure for him to come home and be taken care of here. He mustn't stay there any longer and listen to those alarmist doctors. You are doing this entirely for his sake. Tell your Papa that I want him to come home, that I miss him very much.

ALEXANDRA: [Slowly] Yes, Mama.

REGINA: [To the rest. Rises] I must go and start getting Alexandra ready now. [Crosses U.C. to stairs] Why don't you all go home?

BEN: [Rises] I'll attend to the railroad ticket. One of the boys will bring it over. [Crosses U.R. back of sofa] Good night, everybody. Have a nice trip, Alexandra. The food on the train is very good. The celery is so crisp. Have a good time and act like a little lady. [He exits]

REGINA: [On landing] Good night, Ben. Good night, Oscar.——[Playfully] Don't be so glum, Oscar. It makes you look as if you had chronic indigestion. [He does not answer]

BIRDIE: Good night, Regina.

REGINA: Good night, Birdie. [Exit upstairs]

OSCAR: [Starts for hall, to Birdie and Leo] Come along.

LEO: [As he crosses U.R. to Alexandra] Imagine your not wanting to go! What a little fool you are. [Alexandra crosses D.L.] Wish it were me. What I could do in a place like Baltimore!

ALEXANDRA: [Angrily, looking away from him] Mind your business. I can guess the kind of things you could do.

LEO: [Laughs] Oh, no, you couldn't. [He exits]
REGINA: [Calling from top of stairs] Come on, Alexandra.

I

BIRDIE: [Quickly, crossing D.L. to Alexandra, softly] Zan.

ALEXANDRA: [Quietly] I don't understand about my going, Aunt Birdie. [Shrugs] But anyway, Papa will be home again. [Pats Birdie's arm] Don't worry about me. I can take care of myself. Really I can.

BIRDIE: [Shakes her head, softly] That's not what I'm worried about, Zan——

ALEXANDRA: [Comes close to her] What's the matter?

BIRDIE: It's about Leo-

ALEXANDRA: [Whispering] He beat the horses. That's why we were late getting back. We had to wait until they cooled off. He always beats the horses as if——

BIRDIE: [Whispering frantically, holding Alexandra's hands] He's my son. My own son. But you are more to me—more to me than my own child. I love you more than anybody else——

ALEXANDRA: Don't worry about the horses. I'm sorry I told you.

BIRDIE: [Her voice rising] I am not worrying about the horses. I am worrying about you. You are not going to marry Leo. I am not going to let them do that to you——

ALEXANDRA: Marry? To Leo? [Laughs] I wouldn't marry, Aunt Birdie. I've never even thought about it-

BIRDIE: Hush! But they have thought about it. [Wildly] Zan, I couldn't stand to think about such a thing. You and——

[Oscar has come into doorway on Alexandra's speech. He is standing quietly, listening]

ALEXANDRA: [Laughs] But I'm not going to marry. And I'm certainly not going to marry Leo.

[Oscar takes one step into the room]

BIRDIE: Don't you understand? They'll make you. They'll make you——

ALEXANDRA: [Takes Birdie's hands, quietly, firmly] That's foolish, Aunt Birdie. I'm grown now. Nobody can make me do anything.

BIRDIE: I just couldn't stand-

OSCAR: [Sharply] Birdie. [Birdie looks up, draws quickly away from Alexandra. She stands rigid, fearful. Quietly] Birdie, get your hat and coat.

ADDIE: [Unseen calls from upstairs hallway] Come on, baby. Your Mama's waiting for you, and she ain't nobody to keep waiting.

ALEXANDRA: All right. [Then softly, embracing Birdie] Good night, Aunt Birdie. [Crosses upstairs. As she passes Oscar] Good night, Uncle Oscar. [Birdie begins to move slowly towards door as Alexandra climbs the stairs. Alexandra is almost out of view when Birdie reaches Oscar in doorway. As Birdie quickly attempts to pass him, he slaps her hard, across the face. Birdie cries out, puts her hand to her face. On the cry, Alexandra turns, begins to run down the stairs] Aunt Birdie! What happened? What happened? I——

BIRDIE: [Softly, without turning] Nothing, darling. Nothing happened. [Quickly, as if anxious to keep Alexandra from coming close] Now go to bed. [Oscar exits] Nothing happened. [Turns to Alexandra, who is holding her hand] I only—I only twisted my ankle.

[She goes out. Alexandra stands on stairs looking after her as if she were puzzled and frightened]

MEDIUM CURTAIN

ACT II.

Scene: Same as Act I. A week later, morning. At Rise: The light comes from the open shutter of the R. window; the other shutters are tightly closed. Addie is standing at window, looking out. Near the dining-room doors are brooms, mops, rags, etc. After a second Oscar comes into entrance hall, looks in the room, shivers, decides not to take his hat and coat off, comes into the room. At the sound of the door, Addie turns to see who has come in.

ADDIE: [Without interest] Oh, it's you, Mr. Oscar. [Addie turns back to window, closes windows] OSCAR: What is this? It's not night. [Crosses to above sofa R.] What's the matter here? [Shivers. Addie crosses to U.W. windows] Fine thing at this time of the morning. Blinds all closed. [Addie begins to open shutters. The room lights up] Where's Miss Regina? It's cold in here. [He crosses C.]

ADDIE: Miss Regina ain't down yet.

oscar: She had any word?

ADDIE: [Wearily, crossing D. to chair D.R. picks up feather duster] No sir.

OSCAR: [Crossing to settee L.] Wouldn't you think a girl that age could get on a train at one place and have sense enough to get off at another? [He sits settee]

ADDIE: [At chair D.R.] Something must have happened. [Crosses to sofa R. for broom] If Zan say she was coming last night, she's coming last night. Unless something happened. [Crosses U.L.] Sure fire disgrace to let a baby like that go all that way alone to bring home a sick man without—oscar: You do a lot of judging around here, Addie, eh? Judging of your white folks, I mean.

ADDIE: [Looks at him, sighs] I'm tired. I been up all night watching for them.

REGINA: [Who cannot be seen. Speaking from upstairs hall] Who's downstairs, Addie? [She appears in a dressing gown, peers down from landing. Addie picks up carpet sweeper, dustpan and brush, standing R. of dining-room door, exits L.] Oh, it's you,

Oscar. What are you doing here so early? I haven't been down yet. I'm not finished dressing.

OSCAR: [Speaking up to her] You had any word from them?

REGINA: No.

OSCAR: Then something certainly has happened. People don't just say they are arriving on Thursday night, and they haven't come by Friday morning.

REGINA: Oh, nothing has happened. Alexandra just hasn't got sense enough to send a message.

OSCAR: [Rises, crosses U.c.] If nothing's happened, then why aren't they here?

REGINA: You asked me that ten times last night. My, you do fret so, Oscar. Anything might have happened. They may have missed connections in Atlanta, the train may have been delayed—oh, a hundred things could have kept them.

OSCAR: [Crosses R.] Where's Ben?

REGINA: [As she disappears up stairs] Where should he be? At home, probably. Really, Oscar, I don't tuck him in his bed and I don't take him out of it. Have some coffee and don't worry so much.

OSCAR: Have some coffee? [Crosses U.C.] There isn't any coffee. [Looks at his watch, shakes his head. After a second Cal enters with a large silver tray, coffee urn, 6 small cups, newspaper. He puts tray on table U.C., begins to set out cups] Oh, there you are. [Crosses D.C.] Is everything in this house always late?

[Takes off coat and hat]

CAL: [Looks at him sur_{\times}rised] You ain't out shooting this morning, Mr. Oscar?

OSCAR: [Places coat and hat on chair U.C.] First day I missed since I had a head cold. First day I missed in eight years. [Crosses D.L., sits on settee]

CAL: Yes, sir. I bet you. Simon he say you had a mighty good day yesterday morning. That's what Simon say. [Brings Oscar small coffee and newspaper]

OSCAR: Pretty good, pretty good. [Opens newspaper]

cal: [Laughs, slyly, puts coffee cup on table L. of settee, moves table toward Oscar] Bet you got enough bob-white and squirrel to give every nigger in town a Jesus-party. Most of 'em ain't had no meat since the cotton picking was over. Bet they'd give anything for a little piece of that meat—

OSCAR: [Turns his head to look at Cal] Cal, if I catch a nigger in this town going shooting, you know what's going to happen.

[Leo enters]

cal: [Hastily steps back] Yes sir, Mr. Oscar. I didn't say nothing about nothing. It was Simon who told me and—Morning, Mr. Leo. You gentlemen having your breakfast with us here?

LEO: [Comes immediately to Oscar] The boys in the bank don't know a thing. They haven't had any message.

[Cal waits for an answer, gets none, shrugs, moves to door L., looks back at them, exits]

OSCAR: [Peers at Leo] What you doing here, son? LEO: You told me to find out if the boys at the bank had any message from Uncle Horace or Zan—

OSCAR: I told you if they had a message to bring it here. I told you that if they didn't have a message to stay at the bank and do your work.

LEO: Oh, I guess I misunderstood.

OSCAR: You didn't misunderstand. You just were looking for any excuse to take an hour off. [Leo crosses to table U.C., pours coffee] You got to stop that kind of thing. You got to start settling down. You going to be a married man one of these days.

LEO: Yes, sir.

oscar: You also got to stop with that woman in Mobile. [As Leo is about to speak he puts up a hand. Leo turns back for sugar] You're young and I haven't got no objections to outside women. That is, I haven't got no objections so long as they don't interfere with serious things. Outside women are all right in their place, but now isn't their place! You got to realize that.

LEO: [Nods] Yes, sir. I'll tell her. She'll act all right about it. [He drinks his coffee]

OSCAR: Also, you got to start working harder at the bank. You got to convince your Uncle Horace you going to make a fit husband for Alexandra.

LEO: [Crossing D. to back of settee L.] What do you think has happened to them? Supposed to be here last night——[Laughs—crosses to c.] Bet you Uncle Ben's mighty worried. Seventy-five thousand dollars worried.

OSCAR: [Smiles happily] Ought to be worried. Damn well ought to be. First he don't answer the letters, then he don't come home—— [Giggles]

LEO: [Crosses L. to chair L.c.] What will happen if Uncle Horace don't come home or don't——?

oscar: Or don't put up the money? Oh, we'll get it from outside. Easy enough.

LEO: [Surprised] But you don't want outsiders. [Sits chair L.C.]

oscar: What do I care who gets my share? I been shaved already. Serve Ben right if he had to give away some of his.

LEO: Damn shame what they did to you.

[Picks up cup to drink]

oscar: [Looking up the stairs] Don't talk so loud. [Leo starts to speak] Don't you worry. When I die, you'll have as much as the rest. You might have yours and Alexandra's. I'm not so easily licked.

LEO: [Smoothly] I wasn't thinking of myself, oscar: Well, you should be, you should be. It's every man's duty to think of himself.

LEO: [Turns to Oscar] You think Uncle Horace don't want to go in on this?

OSCAR: [Giggles] That's my hunch. [Leo drinks] He hasn't showed any signs of loving it yet.

[Leo looks at empty cup]

LEO: [Laughs-turns front] But he hasn't listened to Aunt Regina yet, either. Oh, he'll go along. It's too good a thing. [Rises] Why wouldn't he want to? [Crosses u.c. to pour another coffee] He's got plenty and plenty to invest with. He don't even have to sell anything. Eighty-eight thousand worth of Union Pacific bonds sitting right in his safe deposit box. All he's got to do is open the box. [Turns front]

OSCAR: [After a pause. Looks at his watch] Mighty late breakfast in this fancy house. [Leo drinks] Yes, he's had those bonds for fifteen years. Bought them when they were low and just locked them up.

LEO: [Nods—steps D.C.] Yeah. Just has to open the box and take them out. That's all. Easy as easy can be. [Laughs] The things in that box! There's all those bonds, looking mighty fine. [Oscar slowly puts down his newspaper and turns to Leo] Then right next to them is a baby shoe of Zan's and a cheap old cameo on a string, and, and—nobody'd believe this—a piece of an old violin. Not even a whole violin. Just a piece of an old thing, a piece of a violin.

oscar: [Very softly, as if he were trying to control his voice—looking at Leo] A piece of a violin! What do you think of that!

LEO: Yes, siree. [Crossing R. to table, puts cup down] A lot of other crazy things, too. [Turns to Oscar who is staring at him] A poem, I guess it is, signed with his mother's name, and two old school books with notes and——

[Leo catches Oscar's look. His voice trails off. He turns his head away]

OSCAR: [Very softly] How do you know what's in the box, son?

LEO: [Stops, draws back, frightened, realizing what he has said. Then after a second, he manages to speak] Oh, well, well—er. [Crossing L. to chair L.c.] Well, one of the boys, sir. It was one of the boys at the bank. He took old Mander's keys. It was Joe Horns. He just up and took Mander's keys and, and—well, took the box out. [Quickly] Then they all asked me if I wanted to see, too. So I looked a little, I guess, but then I made them close up the box quick and I told them never—

OSCAR: [Looks at him] Joe Horns, you say? He opened it?

LEO: Yes, sir, yes he did. My word of honor. [Very nervously looking away] I suppose that don't excuse me for looking,— [Looking at Oscar] but I did make him close it up and put the keys back in Mander's drawer—

OSCAR: [Leans forward, very softly] Tell me the truth, Leo. I am not going to be angry with you. Did you open the box yourself?

LEO: No sir, I didn't. I told you I didn't. No, oscar: [Irritated, patient] I am not going to be angry with you. [Leo turns—crosses to table R. Watching Leo carefully] Sometimes a young fellow deserves credit for looking round him to see what's going on. Sometimes that's a good sign in a fellow your age. [Leo turns head to listen. Oscar rises]

Many great men have made their fortune with their eyes. [Crosses to c.] Did you open the box?

LEO: [Very puzzled] No. I—oscar: [Taking a step to him] Did you open the box? It may have been—[Moving to Leo] well, it may have been a good thing if you had.

LEO: [After a long pause] I opened it.

OSCAR: [Quickly] Is that the truth? [Leo nods] Does anybody else know that you opened it? Come, Leo, don't be afraid of speaking the truth to me.

LEO: No. Nobody knew. Nobody was in the bank when I did it. But---- oscar: Did your Uncle Horace ever know you opened it?

LEO: [Shakes his head] He only looks in it once every six months when he cuts the coupons, and sometimes Mander even does that for him. Uncle Horace don't even have the keys. Mander keeps them for him. Imagine not looking at all that. You can bet if I had the bonds, I'd watch 'em like—— oscar: If you had them. [Turns front, crossing R. to sofa. Leo watches him] If you had them. Then you could have the share in the mill, you and me. [Turns to Leo] A fine, big share, too. [Pauses—shrugs] Well, a man can't be shot for wanting to see his son get on in the world, can he, boy?

[Oscar sits on sofa R.]

LEO: [Looks up, begins to understand] No, he can't! Natural enough. [Laughs] But I haven't got the bonds and Uncle Horace has. And now we can just sit back and wait to be a millionaire.

oscar: [Innocently] You think your Uncle Horace likes you well enough to lend you the bonds if he decides not to use them himself?

LEO: Papa, it must be that you haven't had your breakfast! [Laughs loudly] Lend me the bonds! My God-oscar: [Disappointed] No, I suppose not. Just a fancy of mine. A loan for three months, maybe four, easy enough for us to pay it back then. Anyway, this is only April—— [Slowly counting the months on his fingers] and if he doesn't look at them until Fall, he wouldn't even miss them out of the box.

LEO: That's it. He wouldn't even miss them. Ah, well-

OSCAR: No, sir. Wouldn't even miss them. How could he miss them if he never looks at them? [Sighs as Leo stares at him] Well, here we are sitting around waiting for him to come home and invest his money in something he hasn't lifted his hand to get. [Leo crosses L.c.] But I can't help thinking he's acting strange. You laugh when I say he could lend you the bonds if he's not going to use them himself. But would it hurt him?

LEO: [Slowly looking at Oscar] No. No, it

OSCAR: People ought to help other people. But that's not always the way it happens. [Ben enters, hangs his coat and hat on hall tree. Very carefully] And so sometimes you got to think of yourself. [As Leo stares at him, Ben appears in doorway] Morning, Ben.

BEN: [Coming in, carrying his newspaper. Crosses to chair R.C.] Fine, sunny morning, Any news from the runaways?

[Ben sits chair R.C.]

REGINA: [On landing] There's no news or you would have heard it. [Coming down stairs] Quite a convention so early in the morning, aren't you all? [Goes to coffee urn]

OSCAR: You rising mighty late these days. Is that the way they do things in Chicago society?

BEN: [Looking at his paper] Old Carter died up in Senateville. Eighty-one is a good time for us all, eh? What do you think has really happened to Horace, Regina?

REGINA: Nothing.

BEN: [Too casually, still reading] You don't think maybe he never started from Baltimore and never intends to start?

REGINA: [Irritated—steps D.] Of course they've started. Didn't I have a letter from Alexandra? What is so strange about people arriving late? [Crosses U. to table—pours coffee] He has that cousin in Savannah he's so fond of. He may have stopped to see him. They'll be along today some time, very flattered that you and Oscar are so worried about them. [Steps D.]

BEN: I'm a natural worrier. Especially when I am getting ready to close a business deal and one of my partners remains silent and invisible.

REGINA: [Laughs] Oh, is that it? I thought you were worried about Horace's health.

OSCAR: Oh, that too. Who could help but worry? I'm worried. This is the first day I haven't shot since my head cold.

REGINA: [Starts toward dining room] Then you haven't had your breakfast. Come along.

[Oscar and Leo follow her. Ben remains seated] BEN: Regina. [She turns at dining-room door] That cousin of Horace's has been dead for years and, in any case, the train does not go through Savannah.

REGINA: [Laughs. Then continues into dining room, seats herself, motions to Leo and Oscar] Did he die? You're always remembering about people dying. [Ben rises, leaves newspaper on table, crosses U.L. to dining room] Now I intend to eat my breakfast in peace, and read my newspaper. [Rings bell]

BEN: [Goes toward dining room as he talks] This is second breakfast for me. My first was bad. Celia ain't the cook she used to be. Too old to have taste any more. If she hadn't belonged to Mama, I'd send her off to the country.

[Cal is putting two silver serving dishes on table. Oscar and Leo start to eat. Ben seats himself] LEO: Uncle Horace will have some tales to tell, I bet. Baltimore is a lively town.

REGINA: [To Cal] The grits isn't hot enough. Take it back.

CAL: Oh, yes'm. [Calling into kitchen as he exits off dining room] Grits didn't hold the heat. Grits didn't hold the heat.

LEO: When I was at school three of the boys and myself took a train once and went over to Baltimore. It was so big we thought we were in Europe. I was just a kid then——

REGINA: [Looks up, helps herself from a dish] I find it very pleasant—— [Addie enters from L.] to have breakfast alone. I hate chattering before I've had something hot. [Cal has come back, closes dining-room doors] Do be still, Leo.

[Addie comes into the room, begins gathering up cups, carries them to the large tray, then quickly she runs into the hall. Outside there are the sounds of Voices and People moving about. A few seconds later Addie appears again in doorway, her arm around the shoulders of Horace Giddens, supporting him. Horace is a tall man of about forty-five. He has been goodlooking, but now his face is tired and ill. He walks stiffly, as if it were an enormous effort, and carefully, as if he were unsure of his balance. Addie takes off his overcoat and hangs it on hall tree. She then helps him across to the chair L.C.]

HORACE: [As they are crossing] How are you, Addie? How have you been?

ADDIE: I'm all right, Mr. Horace. I've just been worried about you.

[Horace sits in chair. Alexandra enters. She is flushed and excited, her hat awry, her face dirty. Her arms are full of packages, but she comes quickly to Addie]

ALEXANDRA: Now don't tell me how worried you were. We couldn't help it and there was no way to send a message.

ADDIE: [To Horace, begins to take packages from Alexandra] Yes, sir, I was mighty worried.

ALEXANDRA: We had to stop in Mobile over night. Papa—— [Looks at him] Papa didn't feel well. The trip was too much for him, and I made him stop and rest—— [As Addie takes last package] No, don't take that. That's Father's medicine. [Crosses D. to table R.C. Addie puts the packages on the chair L. of table U.C., then crosses to Alexandra] I'll hold it. It mustn't break. Now, about the stuff outside. Papa must have his wheel chair. I'll get that and the valises——

[Alexandra starts to go, but Addie stops her]
ADDIE: [Very happy, holding Alexandra's arms]
Since when you got to carry your own valises? Since when I ain't old enough to hold a bottle of medicine? [Horace coughs. Turns and steps to Horace. Alexandra looks at Horace] You feel all right, Mr. Horace?

HORACE: [Nods] Glad to be sitting down.

ALEXANDRA: [Opening package of medicine on table R.C.] He doesn't feel all right. [Addie looks at her, then at Horace] He just says that. The trip was very hard on him, and now he must go right to bed.

ADDIE: [Looking at him carefully] Them fancy doctors, they give you help?

HORACE: They did their best.

LEO: [In dining room] Papa, can I have your part of the paper?

ALEXANDRA: [Has become conscious of the voices in dining room] I bet Mama was worried. I better tell her we're here now. [She starts for door]

HORACE: Zan. [She stops, steps D. to above settee L.] Not for a minute, dear.

ALEXANDRA: Oh, Papa, you feel bad again. I knew you did. Do you want your medicine?

HORACE: No, I don't feel that way. I'm just tired, darling. Let me rest a little.

ALEXANDRA: Yes, but Mama will be mad if I don't tell her we're here.

ADDIE: They're all in there eating breakfast.

ALEXANDRA: Oh, are they all here? [Crosses to Addie] Why do they always have to be here? I was hoping Papa wouldn't have to see anybody, that it would be nice for him and quiet.

ADDIE: [Patting Alexandra's arm] Then let your Papa rest for a minute.

HORACE: Addie, I bet your coffee's as good as ever. They don't have such good coffee up North. [Looks hungrily at urn] Is it as good, Addie?

[Addie starts for coffee urn]

ALEXANDRA: No. [Step to Addie—stops her] Dr. Reeves said not much coffee. Just now and then. [Proudly to Addie] I'm the nurse now, Addie.

ADDIE: You'd be a better one if you didn't look so dirty. [Taking Alexandra to stairs] Now go and take a bath. Miss Grownup. Change your linens, get out a fresh dress and give your hair a good brushing—go on—

ALEXANDRA: Will you be all right, Papa? ADDIE: [Slapping her backside] Go on.

ALEXANDRA: [On stairs, talks as she goes up] The pills Papa must take once every four hours. [Addie steps into room] And the bottle only when—only if he feels very bad. [On landing] Now don't move until I come back and don't talk much and remember about his medicine, Addie——

ADDIE: Ring for Belle and have her help you and then I'll make you a fresh breakfast.

ALEXANDRA: [As she disappears up stairs] How's Aunt Birdie? Is she here?

ADDIE: [Crosses D.R. of Horace] It ain't right for you to have coffee? It will hurt you?

HORACE: [Slowly] Nothing can make much difference now. Get me a cup, Addie. [She looks at him, crosses to urn, pours a cup] Funny. They can't make coffee up North. [Addie brings him a cup] They don't like red pepper, either. [He takes cup and gulps it greedily] God, that's good. You remember how I used to drink it? Ten, twelve cups a day. [Slight laugh as he picks up cup again. He speaks more slowly] Addie, before I see anybody else, I want to know why Zan came to fetch me home.

She's tried to tell me, but she doesn't seem to know herself. [Drinks]

ADDIE: [Turns away] I don't know. [Crosses R. to table] All I know is big things are going on. [To Horace] Everybody going to be high-tone rich. Big rich. You too. [Looks away—at table] All because smoke's going to start out of a building that ain't even up yet. [She angrily creases the medicine bottle paper on the table]

HORACE: I've heard about it.

ADDIE: And, er— [Hesitates—steps to him] And—well, Zan, she going to marry Mr. Leo in a little while.

HORACE: [Looks at her, then very slowly] What are you talking about?

ADDIE: [Crossing to R. of Horace] That's right. That's the talk, God help us.

HORACE: [Angrily] What's the talk?

ADDIE: I'm telling you. There's going to be a wedding—— [Angrily clenches paper in her hand, turns head away] Over my dead body there is.

HORACE: [He hands cup to Addie, not looking at her. After a second, quietly] Go and tell them I'm home.

ADDIE: [Hesitates] Now you ain't to get excited. You're to be in your bed——

HORACE: Go on, Addie. Go and say I'm back.

[Addie takes cup and paper to tray, looking at him as he is rising, then crosses L. and opens dining-room doors. He rises with difficulty, stands stiff as if he were in pain facing the dining room]

ADDIE: [Opens doors, then stands in corner U.L.] Miss Regina. They're home. They got here——

[Everybody turns to look at her]

BEN: They are? oscar: Good. LEO: Just now? REGINA: Horace.

[Regina quickly rises, runs into the room. Others follow her]

REGINA: [Warmly] Horace! You've finally arrived.

[As she kisses him, the others come forward, all talking together]

BEN: [In doorway, carrying a napkin] Well, sir, you had us all mighty worried.

[He steps forward. They shake hands. Addie watches them, then exits L.]

OSCAR: [Crossing to above settee] You're a sight for sore eyes.

HORACE: Hello Ben.

[Ben crosses R.C. Leo enters eating biscuit]

OSCAR: And how you feel? Tip-top, I bet, because that's the way you're looking.

HORACE: [Coldly, irritated with Oscar's lie] Hello, Oscar. Hello Leo, [Leo steps D. extends hand] how are you?

LEO: [Shaking hands] I'm fine, sir. But a lot better now that you're back.

REGINA: [Steps to Horace] Now sit down. [Leo backs away D.L. as Horace sits] What did happen to you and where's Alexandra? I am so excited about seeing you that I almost forgot about her.

HORACE: I didn't feel good, a little weak, I guess, and we stopped overnight to rest. Zan's upstairs washing off the train dirt.

REGINA: [Crossing above Horace, to his L.] Oh, I am so sorry the trip was hard on you. I didn't think that——

HORACE: [Sarcastically, looking around at them] Well, it's just as if I had never been away. All of you here——

BEN: Waiting to welcome you home.

[Birdie bursts in. She is wearing a flannel kimono and her face is flushed and excited. Ben crosses D.R. to mantel]

BIRDIE: [Runs to him, kisses him] Horace!

HORACE: [Warmly pressing her arm] I was just wondering where you were, Birdie.

BIRDIE: [Excited] Oh, I would have been here. I didn't know you were back until Simon said he saw the buggy—— [She draws back to look at him. Her face sobers] Oh, you don't look well, Horace. No you don't.

OSCAR: [Annoyed. Turns on Leo] Don't stand there holding that biscuit in your hand.

[Crosses R. to above chair R.C.]

LEO: Oh. Well. I'll just finish my breakfast, Uncle Horace, and then I'll give you all the news about the bank——

[He exits into dining room, taking newspaper from settee]

OSCAR: [Comes to R. of Birdie] And what is that costume you have on?

BIRDIE: [Is looking at Horace] Now that you're home, you'll feel better. Plenty of good rest and we'll take such fine care of you—— [Stops] But where is Zan? [Horace motions to staircase] I missed her so much.

OSCAR: I asked you what is that strange costume you're parading around in?

BIRDIE: [Nervously, backing toward stairs] Me? [Looks at costume—drops Horace's hand. Oscar crosses U.R.] Oh! It's my wrapper. I was so excited about Horace I just rushed out of the house——

OSCAR: Did you come across the square dressed that way? My dear Birdie, I——

HORACE: [To Regina, wearily] Yes, it's just like old times.

REGINA: [Quickly to Oscar] Now no fights. This is a holiday.

BIRDIE: [Runs quickly up stairs] Zan! Zannie!

OSCAR: Birdie! [She stops]

BIRDIE: Tell Zan I'll be back in a little while. [Exits door R.]

REGINA: [To Oscar and Ben] Why don't you go finish your breakfast—— [Looks at Oscar. He looks at Ben, then crosses into dining room. Regina crosses D.C.] and let Horace rest for a minute?

BEN: [Crossing to dining room. Regina crosses D.R.] Never leave a meal unfinished. There are too many poor people who need the food. Mighty glad to see you home, Horace. Fine to have you back. Fine to have you back.

OSCAR: [To Leo as Ben is closing dining-room doors] Your mother has gone crazy. Running around the streets like a woman——

[The moment Regina and Horace are alone, they become awkward and self-conscious]

REGINA: [Laughs awkwardly] Well. Here we are. It's been a long time. [Horace smiles] Five months. You know, Horace, I wanted to come and be with you in the hospital, but I didn't know where my duty was. Here, or with you. But you know how much I wanted to come.

HORACE: That's kind of you, Regina. There was no need to come.

REGINA: Oh, but there was. Five months lying there all by yourself, no kin-folk, no friends. Don't try to tell me you didn't have a bad time of it.

HORACE: I didn't have a bad time. [As she shakes her head, he becomes insistent] No, I didn't, Regina. Oh, at first when I—when I heard the news about myself—but after I got used to that, I liked it there.

REGINA: You liked it? [Coldly] Isn't that strange! You liked it so well you didn't want to come home?

HORACE: That's not the way to put it. [Then, kindly, as he sees her turn her head away] But there I was and I got kind of used to it, kind of to like lying there and thinking. [Smiles] I never had much time to think before. And time's become valuable to me.

REGINA: It sounds almost like a holiday. [Takes a step R.]

HORACE: [Laughs] It was, sort of. The first holiday I've had since I was a little kid.

REGINA: And here I was thinking you were in pain and——

HORACE: [Quietly] I was in pain.

REGINA: And instead you were having a holiday! [She sits chair R.c.] A holiday of thinking. Couldn't you have done that here?

HORACE: I wanted to do it before I came here. I was thinking about us.

REGINA: About us? About you and me? Thinking about you and me after all these years? [Unpleasantly. Rises, crosses D.R.] You shall tell me everything you thought—some day.

HORACE: [There is silence for a minute] Regina. [She turns to him] Why did you send Zan to Baltimore?

REGINA: Why? Because I wanted you home. [Crossing to him] You can't make anything suspicious out of that, can you?

HORACE: I didn't mean to make anything suspicious about it. [Hesitantly, taking her hand] Zan said you wanted me to come home. I was so pleased at that and touched, it made me feel good.

REGINA: [Taking away her hand, turns] Touched that I should want you home?

HORACE: [Sighs] I'm saying all the wrong things, as usual. Let's try to get along better. There isn't so much more time. Regina, what's all this crazy talk I've been hearing about Zan and Leo? [Slight laugh] Zan and Leo marrying?

REGINA: [Turning to him, sharply] Who gossips so much around here?

HORACE: [Shocked] Regina!

REGINA: [Annoyed, anxious to quiet him, steps to him] It's some foolishness that Oscar thought up. I'll explain later. I have no intention of allowing any such arrangement. It was simply a way of keeping Oscar quiet in all this business I've been writing you about——

HORACE: [Carefully] What has Zan to do with any business of Oscar's? Whatever it is, you had better put it out of Oscar's head immediately. You know what I think of Leo.

REGINA: But there's no need to talk about it now. HORACE: There is no need to talk about it ever. Not as long as I live. [Regina turns crosses R. Horace stops, slowly, turns to look at her] As long as I live. I've been in a hospital for five months. Yet since I've been here you have not once asked me about—about my health. [Then gently] Well, I suppose they've written you. I can't live very long.

REGINA: [Coldly] I've never understood why people have to talk about this kind of thing. [Crosses U.R.]

HORACE: [There is a silence. Then he looks up at her, his face cold] You misunderstand. [Regina pacing U.R.C.] I don't intend to gossip about my sickness. I thought it was only fair to tell you. I was not asking for your sympathy.

REGINA: [Sharply, turns to him] What do the doctors think caused your bad heart?

HORACE: What do you mean?

REGINA: [R. of Horace] They didn't think it possible, did they, that your fancy women may have——?

HORACE: [Smiles, unpleasantly] Caused my heart to be bad? I don't think that's the best scientific theory. You don't catch heart trouble in bed.

REGINA: [Angrily] I didn't think you did. I only thought you might catch a bad conscience—in bed, as you say. [Crosses D.R.]

HORACE: I didn't tell them about my bad conscience. Or about my fancy women. Nor did I tell them that my wife has not wanted me in bed with her for—— [Sharply] How long is it, Regina? [Regina turns to him] Ten years? Did you bring me home for this, to make me feel guilty again? That means you want something. But you'll not make me feel guilty any more. My "thinking" has made a difference.

REGINA: I see that it has.

BEN: [In dining room] Put down that paper, Leo. REGINA: [She looks toward dining-room door. Then comes to him, her manner warm and friendly] It's foolish for us to fight this way. I didn't mean to be unpleasant. I was stupid.

HORACE: [Wearily] God knows I didn't either. I came home wanting so much not to fight, and then all of a sudden there we were. I got hurt and—

REGINA: [Hastily] It's all my fault. I didn't ask about—your illness because I didn't want to remind you of it. Anyway I never believe doctors when they talk about—[Brightly] when they talk like that.

HORACE: [Not looking at her] Well, we'll try our best with each other. [He rises, starts for stairs. He gets as far as chair R.C., when Regina stops him]

REGINA: [Quickly, crossing with him] I'll try. Honestly, I will. Horace, [He stops, turns to her] Horace, I know you're tired out, but—couldn't you stay down here a few minutes longer? I want Ben to tell you something.

HORACE: Tomorrow.

REGINA: I'd like to now. It's very important to me. It's very important to all of us. [Gaily, as she moves toward dining room] Important to your beloved daughter. She'll be a very great heiress——

HORACE: Will she? That's nice.

REGINA: [Opens doors] Ben, are you finished breakfast?

HORACE: Is this the mill business I've had so many letters about?

REGINA: [To Ben] Horace would like to talk to you now.

HORACE: Horace would not like to talk to you now. I am very tired, Regina—[He starts]

REGINA: [Comes to him and stops him] Please. You've said we'll try our best with each other. I'll try. Really, I will. But please do this for me now. [Urging him into chair R.C.] You will see what I've done while you've been away. How I watched your interests. [Laughs gaily] And I've done very well. too. But things can't be delayed any longer. Everything must be settled this week-[Horace crosses -sits chair R.C. Regina crosses to Ben, who is entering. Brings him c. Oscar has stayed in the dining room, his head turned to watch them. Leo is pretending to read newspaper] Now you must tell Horace all about it. Only be quick because he is very tired and must go to bed. [Horace is looking up at her as if he finally understood. His face hardens as she speaks] But I think your news will be better for him than all the medicine in the world.

BEN: [Who is looking at Horace] It could wait. Horace may not feel like talking today.

REGINA: What an old faker you are! You know it can't wait. You know it must be finished this week. [Crosses D.R.] You've been just as anxious for Horace to get here as I've been.

BEN: [Very jovial] I suppose I have been. And why not? Horace has done Hubbard Sons many a good turn. Why shouldn't I be anxious to help him now?

REGINA: [Laughs] Help him! Help him when you need him, that's what you mean. [Sits sofa R.]

BEN: What a woman you married, Horace! [Laughs awkwardly when Horace does not answer] Well, then I'll make it quick. You know what I've been telling you for years. How I've always said that every one of us little Southern business men had great things-- [Extends his arm, moves his fingers] —right beyond our finger-tips. It's been my dream: my dream to make those fingers grow longer. I'm a lucky man, Horace, a lucky man. To dream and to live to get what you've dreamed of. That's my idea of a lucky man. [Looks at his fingers as his arm drops slowly] For thirty years I've cried, bring the cotton mills to the cotton! [Horace opens medicine bottle, pours dose into spoon] Well, finally I got up nerve to go to the Marshall Company in Chicago.

HORACE: [Has finally taken his eyes from Regina] I know all this.

[He takes medicine. Regina rises, steps to him] BEN: Can I get you something?

HORACE: Some water, please.

REGINA: [Turns quickly] Oh, I'm sorry. Let me. [Crosses to tray on table U.C. brings him glass. He drinks as they wait in silence] You feel all right now?

HORACE: Yes. You wrote me. I know all that. [Oscar rises—crosses to dining-room doors]

REGINA: [Triumphantly] But you don't know that in the last few days Ben has agreed to give us—you, I mean—a much larger share.

HORACE: Really? That's very generous of him. [Oscar crosses D. to above settee L.]

BEN: [Laughs] It wasn't so generous of me; it was smart of Regina.

REGINA: [As if she were signalling Horace] I explained to Ben that perhaps you hadn't answered his letters because you didn't think he was offering you enough, and that the time was getting short and you could guess how much he needed you——

HORACE: [Smiles at her—nods] And I could guess that he wants to keep control in the family?

REGINA: [To Ben, triumphantly] Exactly. [To Horace] So I did a little bargaining for you and convinced my brothers they weren't the only Hubbards who had a business sense. [Crosses p. to front sofa]

HORACE: Did you have to convince them of that? How little people know about each other! [Oscar crosses D.L. slowly. Laughs] But you'll know better about Regina next time, eh, Ben? [Ben, Regina, Horace laugh together. Oscar's face is angry] Now let's see. We're getting a bigger share. [Looking at Oscar] Who's getting less?

BEN: Oscar.

HORACE: Well, Oscar, you've grown very unselfish. What's happened to you?

[Leo rises, crosses to dining-room doors]

BEN: [Quickly, before Oscar can answer] Oscar doesn't mind. [Crossing U.L.] Not worth fighting about now, eh, Oscar?

OSCAR: [Angrily] I'll get mine in the end. You can be sure of that. I've got my son's future to think about.

HORACE: [Sharply] Leo? Oh, I see. [Puts his head back, laughs. Regina looks at him nervously] I am beginning to see. Everybody will get theirs.

BEN: [Crossing R. to L. of Horace] I knew you'd see it. Seventy-five thousand, and that seventy-five thousand will make you a million.

REGINA: [Steps to table, leaning forward] It will. Horace, it will.

HORACE: I believe you. [Regina steps back, sits sofa. After a second] Now I can understand Oscar's self-sacrifice, but what did you have to promise Marshall Company besides the money you're putting up?

[Leo crosses D. to back of settee L.]

BEN: They wouldn't take promises. They wanted guarantees.

HORACE: Of what?

BEN: [Nods] Water power. Free and plenty of it. HORACE: You got them that, of course?

BEN: Cheap. You'd think the governor of a great State would make his price a little higher. [Crossing to chair L.C.] From pride, you know. [Horace smiles. Ben smiles] Cheap wages. [Sits chair] What do you mean by cheap wages, I say to Marshall? Less than Massachusetts, he says to me, and that averages eight a week. [Leans back] Eight a week! By God, I tell him, I'd work for eight a week myself. Why, there ain't a mountain white or a town nigger but wouldn't give his right arm for three silver dollars every week, eh Horace?

HORACE: Sure. And they'll take less than that when you get around to playing them off against each other. You can save a little money that way, Ben. [Angrily] And make them hate each other just a little more than they do now.

REGINA: What's all this about?

BEN: [Laughs] There'll be no trouble from anybody, white or black, Marshall said that to me. "What about strikes? That's all we've had in Massachusetts for the last three years." I say to him, "What's a strike? I never heard of one. Come South, Marshall. We got good folks and we don't stand for any fancy fooling."

HORACE: You're right. [Slowly] Well, it looks like you made a good deal for yourselves, and for Marshall, too. [Cal has come into dining room and closes doors. To Ben] Your father used to say he made the thousands and you boys would make the millions. I think he was right. [Rises]

REGINA: [They are all looking at Horace. She laughs, nervously, leans forward] Millions for us, too.

HORACE: Us? You and mc? I don't think so. We've got enough money, Regina. We'll just sit by and watch the boys grow rich. [Steps U.C., holding on to chair. Oscar sits on piano stool. They watch him tensely, as he begins to move toward staircase. He passes Leo, looks at him for a second. Brightly] How's everything at the bank, Leo?

LEO: Fine, sir. Everything is fine.

HORACE: How are all the ladies in Mobile? [Leo draws back. Horace turns, a step to Regina, sharply] Whatever made you think I'd let Zan marry——?

REGINA: [Crosses above table R.] Do you mean that you are turning this down? Is it possible that's what you mean?

BEN: [Nervously, but speaking with good nature—gesturing Regina to be quiet] No, that's not what he means. Turning down a fortune! Horace is tired. He'd rather talk about it tomorrow—

REGINA: We can't keep putting it off this way. Oscar must be in Chicago by the end of the week with the money and contracts. [Crosses to Horace] oscar: [Giggles, pleased] Yes, sir. Got to be there end of the week. [Horace crosses R.] No sense going without the money.

REGINA: [Tensely] I've waited long enough for your answer. I'm not going to wait any longer.

HORACE: [Crossing to stairs, above Regina, very deliberately] I'm very tired now, Regina.

BEN: [Hastily] Now Horace probably has his reasons. Things he'd like explained. Tomorrow will do. I can——

REGINA: [Turns to Ben, sharply] I want to know his reasons now.

[Turns back to Horace]

HORACE: [As he climbs the steps] I don't know them all myself. Let's leave it at that.

REGINA: [Crosses U. to foot of stairs] We shall not leave it at that. We have waited for you here like children. Waited for you to come home.

HORACE: So that you could invest my money. So this is why you wanted me home? Well, I had hoped —— [Quietly] If you are disappointed, Regina, I'm sorry. But I must do what I think best. We'll talk about it another day.

REGINA: We'll talk about it now. Just you and me.

HORACE: [Stops on landing, looks down at her. His voice is tense] Please, Regina. It's been a hard trip. I don't feel well. Please leave me alone now. REGINA: [Quietly] I want to talk to you. Horace, I'm coming up.

[He looks at her for a moment, then moves on again out of sight. She begins to climb stairs]

BEN: [Softly. Regina turns to him as he speaks] Sometimes it is better to wait for the sun to rise again. [She does not answer] And sometimes, as our mother used to tell you, [Regina starts up stairs] it's unwise for a good-looking woman to frown. [Ben rises, crosses U. to landing] Softness and a smile do more to the heart of men—

[She disappears. Ben stands looking up the stairs. A long silence. Then, suddenly, Oscar giggles] oscar: Let us hope she'll change his mind. Let us hope.

[After a second Ben croses to table R., picks up his newspaper, continues to sofa R., sits—begins to read. Oscar looks at Ben. The silence makes Leo uncomfortable]

LEO: [Steps R. to C.] The paper says twenty-seven cases of Yellow Fever in New Orleans. Guess the flood waters caused it. [Nobody pays attention] Thought they were building levees high enough. Like the niggers always say: a man born of woman can't build nothing high enough for the Mississippi.

[Gets no answer. Gives an embarrassed laugh. Upstairs there is the sound of Voices. The Voices are not loud, but Ben, Oscar, Leo become conscious of them. Leo crosses U. to landing, looks up, listens]

REGINA: I can't understand what you mean. I can't believe that you mean to turn this down. This is what you've been waiting for, what all of us have been waiting for. You must be going crazy or you must have reasons that you are not telling us.

HORACE: I don't know my reasons. I just don't want it.

REGINA: You don't want it. But I do want it.

OSCAR: [Pointing up] Now just suppose she don't change his mind? Just suppose he keeps on refusing?
[Leo turns back to them, listens]

BEN: [Without conviction] He's tired. It was a mistake to talk to him today. He's a sick man but he isn't a crazy one.

OSCAR: [Giggles] But just suppose he is crazy. What then?

[Leo crosses slowly to back of sofa L.]

BEN: [Puts down his paper, peers at Oscar] Then we'll go outside for the money. There's plenty who would give it.

OSCAR: And plenty who will want a lot for what they give. The ones who are rich enough to give, will be smart enough to want. That means we'd be working for them, don't it, Ben?

BEN: You don't have to tell me the things I told you six months ago.

oscar: Oh, you're right not to worry. She'll change his mind. She always has.

[There is a silence. Suddenly Regina's voice becomes louder and sharper. All of them begin to listen now. Slowly Ben rises, goes to listen by the staircase. Oscar, watching him, smiles. As they listen Regina's voice becomes very loud. Horace's voice is no longer heard] REGINA: People don't pass up chances like this. I won't let you pass up chances like this. I won't let you pass up this one just because you've gone crazy!

oscar: Maybe.

REGINA: And if you change your mind in a week, it will be too late. It's got to be done now.

HORACE: I won't change my mind. I don't want it. REGINA: You don't want it but I do want it. I'm your wife. I have a right to expect that you will take care of my future. Of your child's future.

OSCAR: But I don't believe it. I never did believe he was going in with us.

BEN: [Turning to him—crosses D.C.] What the hell do you expect me to do?

oscar: [Mildly] Nothing. You done your almighty best. Nobody could blame you if the whole thing just dripped away right through our fingers. [Ben crosses R. to sofa for paper] You can't do a thing. But there may be something I could do for us. [Oscar rises. Ben starts to pick up paper but is stopped by Oscar's words] Or, I might better say, [Crossing to c.] Leo could do for us. [Ben stops, turns, looks at Oscar. Leo is staring at Oscar. Turns to Leo] Ain't that true, son? [Leo crosses D.L.] Ain't it true you might be able to help your own kinfolks?

OSCAR: Leo's got a friend. [Crosses to Ben] Leo's friend owns eighty-eight thousand dollars in Union Pacific Bonds. [Ben turns to look at Leo] Leo's friend don't look at the bonds much, not for five or six months at a time.

BEN: [After a pause] Union Pacific. Uh, huh. Let me understand. Leo's friend would—would lend him these bonds and he——?

OSCAR: [Nods] Would be kind enough to lend them to us.

BEN: [Crossing to C.] Leo.

LEO: [Excited, comes to him] Yes, sir?

BEN: When would your friend be wanting the bonds back?

LEO: [Very nervous] I don't know. I—well, I—oscar: [Sharply—step to him] You told me he won't look at them until fall—

LEO: Oh. That's right. But I—not till fall. Uncle Horace never—

BEN: [Sharply] Be still.

oscan: [Smiles at Leo—crosses to c.] Your Uncle doesn't wish to know your friend's name.

LEO: [Starts to laugh] That's a good one. Not know his name—— oscar: Shut up, Leo! [Leo turns away slowly, moves to table L. Ben turns to Oscar] He won't look at them again until September. That gives us five months. Leo will return the bonds in three months. And we'll have no trouble raising the money once the mills are going up. Will Marshall accept bonds?

[Ben stops to listen to sudden sharp voices from above. The voices are now very angry and very loud]

REGINA: I have a right to expect that.

HORACE: Please go away and leave me alone.

REGINA: I won't leave you alone. I demand that you put up this money and I demand that you do it immediately.

BEN: [Then smiling] Why not? Why not? [Laughs—to Oscar] Good. We are lucky. We'll take the loan from Leo's friend—I think he will make a safer partner than our sister. [Nods toward stairs. Turns to Leo] How soon can you get them?

LEO: Today. Right now. [Steps to Ben] They're in the safe deposit box and——

BEN: [Sharply] I don't want to know where they are.

OSCAR: [Laughs] We will keep it secret from you. [Pats Ben's arm]

BEN: [Smiles] Good. Draw a check for our part. You can take the night train for Chicago. [To Oscar] Well, Oscar, [Holds out his hand—Oscar takes it, they shake hands] good luck to us. [Crosses R. to table]

OSCAR: [Turns to Ben] Leo will be taken care of?

LEO: I'm entitled to Uncle Horace's share. I'd enjoy being a partner——

BEN: [Turns to stare at him] You would? You can go to hell, you little——[Starts toward Leo]

OSCAR: [Nervously, stopping Ben] Now, now. He didn't mean that. I only want to be sure he'll get something out of all this.

BEN: Of course. We'll take care of him. We won't have any trouble about that. I'll see you at the store.

OSCAR: [Nods] That's settled then. Come on, son.

[Starts for door]

LEO: [Puts out his hand—crosses to Ben] I didn't mean just that. I was only going to say what a great day this was for me and—

[Ben ignores his hand]

BEN: Go on. [Crosses R. to front of table. Leo looks at him, turns, follows Oscar out. Ben stands where he is, thinking. Again the Voices upstairs can be heard. Regina's is high and furious. Ben looks up, smiles, winces at the noise]

REGINA: Nobody would turn this down. You must have your reasons. You must have reasons you won't talk about.

[The noise of fists pounding against a door is heard, and Alexandra's voice]

ALEXANDRA: Mama-Mama-don't-

[The noise of running footsteps is heard, and Alexandra comes running down the steps, speaking as she comes, together with the voices upstairs]

REGINA: What are they? What possible reasons could there be? I demand to know. All my life I've had to force you to make something out of yourself. HORACE: Let me alone.

REGINA: I won't let you alone. If I'd let you alone you'd still be working for somebody else.

HORACE: So that's why you wanted me home? REGINA: Yes, that's the reason.

HORACE: Then it's a bad one. Because it won't work.

REGINA: Did you think I wanted you home for yourself? Is that what you thought?

ALEXANDRA: [Almost crying. On landing] Uncle

Ben! [Coming down stairs] Uncle Ben! [Ben crosses U.C.] Please go up. Please make Mama stop. Uncle Ben, he's sick, he's so sick. How can Mama talk to him like that—please, make her stop. She'll——

BEN: Alexandra, you have a tender heart.

ALEXANDRA: Go on up, Uncle Ben, please-

[Suddenly the noise from above stops, and a second later there is the sound of a door opening and then being slammed]

BEN: Now you see. Everything is over. Don't worry. [He starts for door. Alexandra crosses D. to above chair L.C.] Alexandra, I want you to tell your mother how sorry I am that I had to leave. [Crosses to hall] And don't worry so, my dear. Married folk frequently raise their voices, unfortunately.

[He starts to put on his hat and coat as Regina appears on stairs. When she speaks to Ben, her voice is cold and calm]

ALEXANDRA: [Furiously—turns, crosses U. to landing] How can you treat Papa like this! He's sick. He's very sick. Don't you know that! I won't let you.

REGINA: Mind your business, Alexandra. [Alexandra turns down to above settee L., facing L. To Ben on landing] How much longer can you wait for the money?

BEN: [Putting on his coat—steps in] He has refused? My, that's too bad.

REGINA: He will change his mind. I'll find a way to make him. What's the longest you can wait now?

BEN: I could wait until next week. [Steps in] But I can't wait until next week. [He giggles, pleased at the joke] I could but I can't. Could and can't. Well, I must go now. I'm very late——[He starts]

REGINA: [Coming downstairs toward him] You're not going. I want to talk to you.

[She crosses into room]

BEN: [Looks at her, crosses D. to her] Oh, I was about to give Alexandra a message for you. I wanted to tell you that Oscar is going to Chicago tonight, so we can't be here for our usual Friday supper.

REGINA: [Tensely] Oscar is going to Chi---[Softly] What do you mean?

BEN: Just that. Everything is settled. He's going on to deliver to Marshall——

REGINA: [Taking a step to him] I demand to know what—you are lying. You are trying to scare me. You haven't got the money. How could you have it? You can't have——[Ben laughs] you will wait until I——

[Horace comes into view on landing]

BEN: You are getting out of hand. Since when do I take orders from you? [He turns]

REGINA: Wait, you—— [Ben stops. Regina steps to him] How can he go to Chicago? Did a ghost arrive with the money? [Ben starts for hall] I don't believe you. Come back here. [Regina starts after him] Come back here, you——

[The door slams. She stops in the doorway, staring, her fists clenched. After a pause she turns slowly and steps into the room]

HORACE: [Standing on landing of the stairs, very quietly] It's a great day when you and Ben cross swords. I've been waiting for it for years.

ALEXANDRA: Papa, Papa, [Crosses U. to below landing] please go back! You will-HORACE: And so they don't need you, and so you will not have your millions, after all?

REGINA: [Turns slowly] You hate to see anybody live now, don't you? You hate to think that I'm going to be alive and have what I want.

[Comes toward stairs, looking up at him]
HORACE: I should have known you'd think that was the reason.

REGINA: Because you're going to die and you know you're going to die.

ALEXANDRA: [Shrilly] Mama! Don't—Don't listen, Papa. Just don't listen. Go away——

HORACE: Not to keep you from getting what you want. Not even partly that. [Steps down one step, holding on to rail, leaning over to look down at her] I'm sick of you, sick of this house, sick of my life here. I'm sick of your brothers and their dirty tricks to make a dime. [Alexandra turns away, crosses D. to back of settee] There must be better ways of getting rich than cheating niggers on a pound of bacon. Why should I give you the money? [Very angrily] To pound the bones of this town to make dividends for you to spend? You wreck the town, you and your brothers, you wreck the town and live on it. Not me. Maybe it's easy for the dying to be honest. But it's not my fault I'm dying. [Addie enters L., stands at door quietly] I'll do no more harm now. I've done enough. I'll die my own way. And I'll do it without making the world any worse. I leave that to you.

REGINA: [Looks up at him slowly, calmly] I hope you die. I hope you die soon. [Smiles] I'll be waiting for you to die.

ALEXANDRA: [Shrieking] Papa! Don't—don't listen—don't—

ADDIE: Come here, Zan. Come out of this room. [Alexandra runs quickly to Addie, who holds her in her arms. Horace turns slowly and starts upstairs]

MEDIUM CURTAIN

ACT III.

Scene: Same as Act I. Two weeks later. It is late afternoon and it is raining.

AT RISE: Horace is sitting near the window in a wheel chair. On the table next to him is a safe deposit box, and one small bottle of medicine and spoon. Birdie and Alexandra are playing the piano. On the chair R. of table U.C. is a large sewing-basket.

A phrase of the song is played before the curtain rises. As the curtain is going up the song is reaching its conclusion.

BIRDIE: [Counting for Alexandra] One and two and three and four. One and two and three and four. [They finish song and laugh. Alexandra repeats a phrase. Nods—turns to Horace] We used to play together, Horace. Remember?

HORACE: [Has been looking out of window] What, Birdie?

BIRDIE: We played together. You and me.

ALEXANDRA: [Stops playing, looks to Horace, then Birdie] Papa used to play?

BIRDIE: Indeed he did. [Addie appears at door L. in a large kitchen apron. She is wiping her hands on a towel] He played the fiddle and very well, too. [Turns to piano and starts playing]

ALEXANDRA: [Turns to smile at Horace] I never knew----

ADDIE: Where's your Mama?

ALEXANDRA: Gone to Miss Safronia's to fit her dresses.

[Addie nods, starts to exit]

HORACE: Addie.

ADDIE: [Crossing to C.] Yes, Mr. Horace.

HORACE: [Speaks as if he had made a sudden decision] Tell Cal to get his things. I want him to go an errand.

[Addie nods, exits L. Horace moves nervously in his chair, looks out of window]

ALEXANDRA: [Who has been watching him] It's too bad it's been raining all day, Papa. But you can go out in the yard tomorrow. Don't be restless.

HORACE: I'm not restless, darling.

[Alexandra turns to piano and joins Birdie in playing; after playing one measure together Birdie stops and turns to Horace. Alexandra continues playing alone]

BIRDIE: I remember so well the time we played together. [To Alexandra] Your Papa and me. [To Horace] It was the first time Oscar brought me here to supper. I had never seen all the Hubbards together before, [To Alexandra] and you know what a ninny I am and how shy. [Turns to look at Horace] You said you could play the fiddle. [Rises, crosses to table U.C.] and you'd be much obliged if I'd play with you. [Pouring glass of water] I was obliged to you, all right, all right. [Laughs when he does not answer her] Horace, [Steps to him, holding glass] you haven't heard a word I've said.

HORACE: Birdie, when did Oscar get back from Chicago?

BIRDIE: Yesterday. Hasn't he been here yet?

ALEXANDRA: [Stops playing] No. Neither has Uncle Ben since—since that day.

BIRDIE: Oh, [To Alexandra] I didn't know it was that bad. [Turns to Horace] Oscar never tells me anything——

HORACE: [Smiles, nods] The Hubbards have had their great quarrel. I knew it would come some day. [Laughs] It came.

ALEXANDRA: It came. It certainly came all right.

BIRDIE: [Amazed] But Oscar was in such a good humor when he got home, [Addie enters] I didn't—HORACE: Yes, I can understand that.

[Addie is carrying a large tray with three water glasses, a carafe of elderberry wine, and a plate of cookies, which she puts on the table D.L. Birdie hurries to Addie, leaving water glass on table U.C.]

ALEXANDRA: Addie! A party! What for?

ADDIE: [Pouring wine into the three glasses] Nothing for, I had the fresh butter so I made the cakes, and a little elderberry does the stomach good in the rain.

[Addie looks at Horace, then crosses to C., moves chair R.C. upstage, then crosses to him, moves him to C., L. of table R.]

BIRDIE: [Takes her glass and puts Alexandra's on piano] Isn't this nice! A party just for us. Let's play party music, Zan.

[Alexandra begins to play a gay piece]

ADDIE: [To Horace, wheeling his chair to c.] Come over here, Mr. Horace, and don't be thinking so much. [She crosses to table L. for Horace's glass, brings it to him. Alexandra stops playing, turns and watches him] A glass of elderberry will do more good.

[Alexandra reaches for another cake, Birdie pours herself another glass of wine]

ALEXANDRA: [Her mouth full] Good cakes, Addie. It's nice here. Just us. Be nice if it could always be this way.

BIRDIE: [Nods, happily] Quiet and restful. [Drinks, then crosses to piano stool, sits]

ADDIE: [Crossing to table U.C., lights lamp] Well, it won't be that way long. Little while now, even sitting here, you'll hear the red bricks going into place. The next day the smoke'll be pushing out the chimneys [Alexandra crosses to chair at piano, sits] and by church time that Sunday every human born of woman will be living on chicken. [Crossing R. to mantel] That's how Mr. Ben's been telling the story.

HORACE: [Looks at her] They believe it that way?

ADDIE: Believe it? [Placing footstool so that she can reach upstage lamp on mantel. Birdie crosses to table, pours another drink] They use to believing what Mr. Ben orders. There ain't been so much talk around here since Sherman's army didn't come near. [Lights upper mantel lamp]

HORACE: [Softly] They are fools.

ADDIB: [Nods] You ain't born in the South unless you're a fool.

[Addie moves footstool to downstage end of mantel, and lights lower mantel lamp]

BIRDIE: [Has drunk another glass. She has been listening to the others] But we didn't play together after that night. [Crosses to front settee L.] Oscar said he didn't like me to play on the piano. [Turns to Alexandra] You know what he said that night?

[Addie crosses to chair U.C., gets sewing-basket, crosses to chair D.R., turns it to face them,

ALEXANDRA: Who?

BIRDIE: Oscar. He said that music made him nervous. He said he just sat and waited for the next note. [Alexandra laughs] He wasn't poking fun. He meant it. Ah, well——[She finishes her glass, shakes her head. Horace looks at her, smiles. Crossing to Horace] Your Papa don't like to admit it, but he's been mighty kind to me all these years. [Running the back of her hand along his sleeve] Often he'd step in when somebody said something and once—[She stops, turns away, her face still] Once he stopped Oscar from——[She stops, turns steps u.s. Quickly] I'm sorry I said that. [Crossing L. back of settee] Why, here I am so happy and yet I think about bad things. [Laughs nervously] That's not right, now is it?

[Crosses to table L., pours drink, crosses to upper end piano. Cal appears in the door L. He has on an old coat and is carrying a torn umbrella]

ALEXANDRA: Have a cake, Cal.

CAL: [Comes in, takes a cake] Yes'm. You want me, Mr. Horace? [Crosses c. to L. of Horace]

HORACE: What time is it, Cal? [Puts glass on table]

CAL: Bout ten minutes before it's five.

HORACE: All right. Now you walk yourself down to the bank.

[Alexandra starts to play softly]

CAL: It'll be closed. Nobody'll be there but Mr. Mander, Mr. Joe Horns, Mr. Leo——

HORACE: Go in the back way. They'll be at the table, going over the day's business. [Points to deposit box] See that box?

CAL: [Nods] Yes, sir.

HORACE: You tell Mander that Mr. Horace says he's much obliged to him for bringing the box, it arrived all right.

CAL: [Bewildered] He know you got the box. He bring it hisself Wednesday. I opened the door to him and he say, "Hello, Cal, coming on to summer weather"——

HORACE: You say just what I tell you. Understand?

[Birdie crosses to table L. pours drink, stands at table]

CAL: No, sir. I ain't going to say I understand. I'm going down and tell a man he give you something he already know he give you, and you say "understand."

HORACE: Now, Cal-

CAL: Yes, sir. I just going to say you obliged for the box coming all right. I ain't going to understand it, but I'm going to say it———

HORACE: And tell him I want him to come over here after supper, and to bring Mr. Sol Fowler with him.

[Alexandra playing]

CAL: [Nods] He's to come after supper and bring Mr. Sol Fowler, your attorney-at-law, with him.

HORACE: [Smiles] That's right. Just walk right in the back room and say your piece. [Slowly] In front of everybody.

CAL: [Takes step to Horace, then turns away L.] Yes, sir. [Mumbles to himself as he exits L.]

ALEXANDRA: [Who has been watching Horace] Is anything the matter, Papa?

HORACE: Oh, no. Nothing.

ADDIE: [Watching Birdie take another glass of wine] Miss Birdie, that elderberry going to give you a headache spell.

BIRDIE: [Beginning to be drunk. Gaily] Oh, I don't think so. I don't think it will. [Drinks]

ALEXANDRA: [As Horace puts his hand to his throat. Rises, crosses to his L.] Do you want your medicine, Papa?

HORACE: No, no. I'm all right, darling.

BIRDIE: [At L. of table L.] Mama used to give me elderberry wine when I was a little girl. For hiccoughs. [Laughs] You know, I don't think people get hiccoughs anymore. Isn't that funny? [Birdie laughs. Horace and Alexandra laugh, too] I used to get hiccoughs just when I shouldn't have. [Crosses to piano, sits, starts playing, drinks]

ADDIE: [Nods] And nobody get growing pains no more. That is funny. Just as if there was some style in what you get. One year an ailment's stylish [Birdie stops playing] and the next year, it ain't.

BIRDIE: [Turns to them] I remember. It was my first big party, at Lionnet I mean, and I was so excited, [Rises, crosses to table L.] and there I was with hiccoughs and Mama laughing. [Softly, looking at carafe] Mama always laughed. [Picks up carafe] A big party, a lovely dress from Mr. Worth in Paris, France, and hiccoughs. [Pours drink] My brother pounding me on the back and Mama with the elderberry bottle, laughing at me. Everybody was on their way to come, and I was such a ninny, hiccoughing away. [Drinks. Pauses] You know, that was the first day I ever saw Oscar Hubbard. [Crosses to C.] The Ballongs were selling their horses and he was going there to buy. He passed and lifted his hat-we could see him from the window—and my brother, to tease Mama, said maybe we should have invited the Hubbards to the party. He said Mama didn't like them because they kept a store, and he said that was oldfashioned of her. [Her face lights up—looking out] And then, and then, I saw Mama angry for the first time in my life. She said that wasn't the reason. She said she was old-fashioned, but not that way. She said she was old-fashioned enough not to like people who killed animals they couldn't use, and who made their money charging awful interest to poor, ignorant niggers and cheating them on what they bought. She was very angry, Mama was. I had never seen her face like that. And then suddenly she laughed and said, "Look, I've frightened Birdie out of the hiccoughs." [Her head drops, then softly] And so she had. They were all gone. [Moves up to sofa L., sits. Alexandra crosses L. to chair L.C.]

ADDIE: [To her sewing] Yeah, they got mighty well off cheating niggers. [To them] Well, there are people who eat the earth and eat all the people on it like in the Bible with the locusts. Then, there are people who stand around and watch them eat it. [Softly] Sometimes I think it ain't right to stand and watch them do it.

BIRDIE: [Thoughtfully] Like I say, if we could only go back to Lionnet. Everybody'd be better there. They'd be good and kind. I like people to be kind. [Pours drink] Don't you, Horace, don't you like people to be kind?

HORACE: Yes, Birdie.

BIRDIE: [Very drunk now] Yes, that was the first day I ever saw Oscar. Who would have thought——? [Drinks. Quickly—caressing the glass] You all want to know something? Well, I don't like Leo. My very own son, and I don't like him. [Laughs, gaily] My, I guess, I even like Oscar more. [Drinks]

ALEXANDRA: [A step to Birdie] Why did you marry Uncle Oscar?

ADDIE: [Sharply] That's no question for you to be asking.

HORACE: [Sharply] Why not? She's heard enough around here to ask anything.

ALEXANDRA: Aunt Birdie, why did you marry Uncle Oscar?

BIRDIE: [Places glass on table. Pleasantly] I don't know. I thought I liked him. He was so kind to me and I thought it was because he liked me, too. But that wasn't the reason——[Wheels on Alexandra] Ask why he married me! I can tell you that; he's told it to me often enough.

ADDIE: [Leaning forward] Miss Birdie, don't——BIRDIE: [Speaking very rapidly, tensely] My family was good and the cotton on Lionnet's fields was better. Ben Hubbard wanted the cotton and [Rises] Oscar Hubbard married it for him. [Alexandra crosses to Horace] He was kind to me, then. He used to smile at me. He hasn't smiled at me since. Everybody knew that's what he married me for. [Addie rises] Everybody but me. [Turns away, crosses D.L.] Stupid, stupid me.

[Addie puts sewing basket on chair, takes step to Horace]

ALEXANDRA: [To Horace, holding his hand, softly] I see. [Hesitates] Papa, I mean—when you feel better couldn't we go away? I mean, by ourselves. Couldn't we find a way to go——

HORACE: [Placing his hand over hers] Yes, I know what you mean. We'll try to find a way. I promise you, darling.

ADDIE: [Looks at them for a second, then goes L. to Birdie] Rest a bit, Miss Birdie. You get talking like this you'll get a headache and——

BIRDIE: [Sharply turning to her] I've never had a headache in my life. [Crosses U.L. Begins to cry; hysterically] You know it as well as I do. [Turns to

Alexandra. Crossing to her back of settee. Addie crosses U.L.] I never had a headache, Zan. That's a lie they tell for me. I drink. All by myself, in my own room, by myself, I drink. Then, when they want to hide it, they say "Birdie's got a headache again"——

ALEXANDRA: [Comes to her, quickly] Aunt Birdie.
[Addie turns to look at them]

BIRDIE: [Turning away] Even you won't like me now. You won't like me, any more.

ALEXANDRA: I love you. I'll always love you.

BIRDIE: [Furiously] Well, don't. [Turns to Alexandra] Don't love me. Because in twenty years you'll just be like me. They'll do all the same things to you. [Begins to laugh, hysterically] You know what? In twenty-two years I haven't had a whole day of happiness. Oh, a little, like today with you all. But never a single, whole day. I say to myself, if only I had one more whole day, then—[The laugh stops] And that's the way you'll be. And you'll trail after them, just like me, hoping they won't be so mean that day or say something to make you feel so bad—only you'll be worse off because you haven't got my Mama to remember—

[Turns away, her head drops. She stands quietly, swaying a little, holding onto sofa. Alexandra leans down, puts her cheek on Birdie's arm]

ALEXANDRA: [To Birdie] I guess we were all trying to make a happy day. You know, we sit around and try to pretend nothing's happened. We try to pretend we are not here. We make believe we are just by ourselves, some place else, and it doesn't seem to work. [Kisses Birdie's hand, which she has been holding] Come now, Aunt Birdie, I'll walk you home. You and me.

[She takes Birdie's arm, they move slowly out. In the hallway Alexandra places a raincoat over Birdie's shoulders. They exit. Addie and Horace are silent]

ADDIE: Well. [Sighs] First time I ever heard Miss Birdie say a word. [Crossing R. to table R. Horace looks at her] Maybe it's good for her. [Picks up glass from table R.] I'm just sorry Zan had to hear it. [Takes glass to table U.C. Horace moves his head as if he were uncomfortable] You feel bad, don't you? [He shrugs]

HORACE: So you didn't want Zan to hear? It would be nice to let her stay innocent, like Birdie at her age. Let her listen now. Let her see everything. How else is she going to know that she's got to get away? I'm trying to show her that. I'm trying, but I've only got a little time left. She can even hate me when I'm dead, if she'll only learn to hate and fear this.

ADDIE: Mr. Horace-

HORACE: Pretty soon there'll be nobody to help her but you.

ADDIE: [Crossing to him] What can I do?

MORACE: Take her away,

ADDIE: How can I do that? Do you think they'd let me just go away with her——?

HORACE: I'll fix it so they can't stop you when you're ready to go. You'll go, Addie?

ADDIE: [After a second, softly] Yes sir, I promise, [He touches her arm, nods]

HORACE: [After a second, quietly] I'm going to have Sol Fowler make me a new will. They'll make trouble, but you make Zan stand firm and Fowler'll do the rest. [She looks at him, nods, crosses R., front table] Addie, [She turns to Horace] I'd like to leave you something for yourself. I always wanted to.

ADDIE: [Laughs] Don't you do that, Mr. Horace. A nigger woman in a white man's will! I'd never get it nohow.

HORACE: I know. But upstairs in the armoire drawer there's seventeen hundred-dollar bills. It's money left from my trip. It's in an envelope with your name. It's for you.

ADDIE: Seventeen hundred-dollar bills! My God, Mr. Horace, I won't know how to count up that high. [Shyly] It's mighty kind and good of you. I don't know what to say for thanks—

CAL: [Appears in doorway] I'm back. [Stands umbrella in U.L. corner. No answer. Crossing to c.] I'm back.

ADDIE: [Crossing R. to chair D.R., picks up basket, sits] So we see.

HORACE: Well?

CAL: Nothing. I just went down and spoke my piece. Just like you told me, I say Mr. Horace he thank you mightily for the safe box arriving in good shape and he say you come right after supper to his house and bring Mr. Attorney-at-law Sol Fowler with you. Then I wipe my hands on my coat. Every time I ever told a lie in my whole life, I wipe my hands right after. Can't help doing it. Well, while I'm wiping my hands, Mr. Leo jump up and say to me "What box! What you talking about?"

HORACE: [Smiles] Did he?

cal: And Mr. Leo say he got to leave a little early 'cause he got something to do. And then Mr. Mander say Mr. Leo should sit right down and finish up his work and stop acting like somebody made him Mr. President. So he sit down. Now, just like I told you, Mr. Mander was mighty surprised with the message because he knows right well he brought the box——[Pointing to box. Sighs] But he took it all right. Some men take everything easy and some do not.

HORACE: [Puts his head back, laughs] Mr. Leo was telling the truth: he has got something to do. I hope Mander don't keep him too long. [Outside there is the sound of voices. Cal exits R. Addie crosses quickly to Horace, puts basket on table R., begins to wheel his chair toward the stairs. Sharply] No. Leave me where I am.

ADDIE: [Step D. to his L.] But that's Miss Regins coming back.

HORACE: [Nods, looking at door] Go away, Addie.

ADDIE: [Hesitates] Mr. Horace. Don't talk no more today. You don't feel well and it won't do you no good——

HORACE: [As he hears footsteps in the hall] Go on.

[She looks at him for a second, then picks up her sewing from table R. and exits L. as Regina comes in from hall. Horace's chair is now so placed that he is in front of table with the medicine. Regina stands in the hall, shakes umbrella, stands it in U.R. corner, takes off her cloak and throws it over bannister. She stares at Horace]

REGINA: [As she takes off her gloves, crossing to C.] We had agreed that you were to stay in your part of this house and I in mine. This room is my part of the house. Please don't come down here again.

HORACE: I won't.

REGINA: [Crosses D.R. toward bell-cord below mantel] I'll get Cal to take you upstairs.

HORACE: [Smiles] Before you do I want to tell you that after all, we have invested our money in Hubbard, Sons and Marshall, Cotton Manufacturers.

REGINA: [Stops, turns, stares at him] What are you talking about? You haven't seen Ben—When did you change your mind?

HORACE: I didn't change my mind. I didn't invest the money. [Smiles at the expression on her face] It was invested for me.

REGINA: [Angrily] What----?

HORACE: I had eighty-eight thousand dollars' worth of Union Pacific bonds in that safe deposit box. They are not there now. Go and look. [As she stares at him. Points to box] Go and look, Regina. [She crosses quickly to box, opens it. He speaks when she is at table] Those bonds are as negotiable as money. [She closes box]

REGINA: [Turns back to him] What kind of joke are you playing now? Is this for my benefit?

HORACE: I don't look in that box very often, but three days ago, on Wednesday it was, because I had made a decision——

REGINA: I want to know what you are talking about.

HORACE: [Sharply] Don't interrupt me again. [Regina stiffens] Because I had made a decision, I sent for the box. The bonds were gone. Eighty-eight thousand dollars gone. [He smiles at her]

REGINA: [After a moment's silence, quietly crossing U.C.] Do you think I'm crazy enough to believe what you're saying?

HORACE: [Shrugs] Believe anything you like.

REGINA: [Stares at him, slowly] Where did they go to?

HORACE: They are in Chicago. With Mr. Marshall, I should guess.

REGINA: [Crossing D. to chair L.C.] What did they do? Walk to Chicago? Have you really gone crazy? HORACE: Leo took the bonds.

REGINA: [Turns sharply, then speaks softly, without conviction] I don't believe it. HORACE: [Leans forward] I wasn't there but I can guess what happened. [Regina sits chair L.C.] This fine gentleman, to whom you were willing to marry your daughter, took the keys and opened the box. You remember that the day of the fight, Oscar went to Chicago? Well, he went with my bonds that his son Leo had stolen for him. [Pleasantly] And for Ben, of course, too.

REGINA: [Slowly, nods] When did you find out the bonds were gone?

HORACE: Wednesday night.

REGINA: I thought that's what you said. Why have you waited three days to do anything? [Suddenly laughs] This will make a fine story.

HORACE: [Nods] Couldn't it?

REGINA: [Still laughing. Rises, crosses U.L.—takes off hat] A fine story to hold over their heads. How could they be such fools? [Turns to him back of settee]

HORACE: But I'm not going to hold it over their heads.

REGINA: [The laugh stops] What?

HORACE: [Turns his chair to face L.] I'm going to let them keep the bonds—as a loan from you. An eighty-eight thousand dollar loan; they should be grateful to you. They will be, I think.

REGINA: [Slowly, smiles] I see. You are punishing me. But I won't let you punish me. If you won't do anything, I will. Now. [She starts for door]

HORACE: You won't do anything. Because you can't. [Regina stops above chair R.C.] It won't do you any good to make trouble because I shall simply say that I lent them the bonds.

REGINA: [Slowly] You would do that?

HORACE: Yes. [Regina crosses D. to chair L.C.] For once in your life I am tying your hands. There is nothing for you to do.

[There is silence. Then she sits down]

REGINA: I see. You are going to lend them the bonds and let them keep all the profit they make on them, and there is nothing I can do about it. Is that right?

HORACE: Yes.

REGINA: [Softly] Why did you say that I was making this gift?

HORACE: I was coming to that. I am going to make a new will, Regina, leaving you eighty-eight thousand dollars in Union Pacific bonds. The rest will go to Zan. It's true that your brothers have borrowed your share for a little while. After my death I advise you to talk to Ben and Oscar. They won't admit anything and Ben, I think, will be smart enough to see that he's safe. Because I knew about the theft and said nothing. Nor will I say anything as long as I live. Is that clear to you?

REGINA: [Nods, softly, without looking at him] You will not say anything as long as you live.

HORACE: That's right. And by that time they will probably have replaced your bonds, and then they'll belong to you and nobody but us will ever know what happened. [Stops, smiles] They'll be around any minute to see what I am going to do. I took good care to see that word reached Leo. They'll be mighty relieved to know I'm going to do nothing and Ben will think it all a capital joke on you. And that will be the end of that. There's nothing you can do to them, nothing you can do to me.

REGINA: You hate me very much.

HORACE: No.

REGINA: Oh, I think you do. [Puts her head back, sighs] Well, we haven't been very good together. Anyway, I don't hate you either. I have only contempt for you. I've always had.

HORACE: From the very first?

REGINA: I think so.

HORACE: I was in love with you. But why did you marry me?

REGINA: I was lonely when I was young.

HORACE: You were lonely?

REGINA: Not the way people usually mean. Lonely for all the things I wasn't going to get. Everybody in this house was so busy and there was so little place for what I wanted. I wanted the world. Then, and then——[Smiles] Papa died and left the money to Ben and Oscar.

HORACE: And you married me?

REGINA: Yes, I thought—but I was wrong. You were a small-town clerk then. You haven't changed. HORACE: [Nods, smiles] And that wasn't what you wanted.

REGINA: No. No, it wasn't what I wanted. [Pauses, leans back, pleasantly] It took me a little while to find out I had made a mistake. As for you—I don't know. It was almost as if I couldn't stand the kind of man you were. [Smiles, softly] I used to lie there at night, praying you wouldn't come near—

HORACE: Really? It was as bad as that?

REGINA: [Nods] Remember when I went to Doctor Sloan and I told you he said there was something the matter with me and that you shouldn't touch me any more?

HORACE: I remember.

REGINA: But you believed it? I couldn't understand that. I couldn't understand that anybody could be such a soft fool. That was when I began to despise you.

HORACE: [Puts his hand to his throat, glances around at bottle of medicine on table, then to her] Why didn't you leave me?

REGINA: I told you I married you for something. It turned out it was only for this. [Carefully] This wasn't what I wanted, but it was something. I never thought about it much, but if I had, [Horace puts his hand to his throat] I'd have known that you would die before I would. But I couldn't have known that you would get heart trouble so early and so bad. I'm lucky, Horace. I've always been lucky. [Horace turns slowly to medicine] I'll be lucky again.

[Horace looks at her. Then he puts his hand to his throat. Because he cannot reach the bottle he moves the chair closer. He reaches for medicine, takes out cork, picks up spoon, tries to pour some in the spoon, the bottle slips out of his shaking fingers and crashes on the table. He draws in his breath, gasps

HORACE: Please. Tell Addie—the other bottle is upstairs. [She has not moved. She does not move now. He stares at her. Then, suddenly as if he understood, he raises his voice. It is a panic-stricken whisper, too small to be heard outside the room.]

Addie! Addie! Come—

[Stops as he hears the softness of his voice. He makes a sudden, furious spring from the chair to the stairs, taking the first few steps as if he were a desperate runner. On the fourth step he slips, gasps, grasps the rail, makes a great effort to reach the landing. When he reaches the landing, he is on his knees. His knees give way, he falls on the landing, out of view. Regina has not turned during his climb up the stairs. Now she waits a second. Then she goes below the landing, speaks up]

REGINA: Horace. [When there is no answer, she turns, crosses to door L., opens door, calls] Addie! Cal! Come in here. [Crosses R. Starts up the steps. When she is on first step, Addie appears, followed by Cal. Both run toward stairs] He's had an attack. Come up here.

[They run up steps quickly, passing Regina] CAL: My God! Mr. Horace——

REGINA: [They cannot be seen now. Her voice comes from the head of the stairs] Be still, Cal. Bring him in here.

[Before the footsteps and voices have completely died away, Alexandra appears in hall door, in her raincloak and hood. She comes into the room, begins to unfasten the cloak, suddenly looks around, sees the empty wheelchair, stares, begins to move swiftly as if to look in the dining room. At the same moment, Addie runs down the stairs. She turns and stares up at Addie]

ALEXANDRA: Addie! What?

ADDIE: [Takes Alexandra by the shoulders] I'm going for the doctor. Go upstairs.

[Alexandra looks at her, then quickly breaks away and runs up the steps. Addie exits L. The stage is empty for a minute. Then the front door bell begins to ring. When there is no answer it rings again. A second later Leo appears in the hall, talking as he comes in]

LEO: [Very nervous] Hello. [Irritably] Never saw any use ringing a bell when a door was open. If you are going to ring a bell, then somebody should answer it. [Gets in the room, looks around, puzzled, listens, hears no sound] Aunt Regina. [Puts hat on sofa R. No answer. He moves around restlessly, crossing L.] Addie. [Waits, turns crossing C.] Where the hell——? [Crosses D.R. to bell cord, rings it impatiently, twice, waits and gets no answer; calls] Cal! [Rings again, then calls] Cal——

[After a second Cal appears on stair landing]

CAL: [His voice is soft, shaken] Mr. Leo. Miss Regina says you stop that screaming noise.

LEO: [Angrily crosses to table R.] Where is every-body?

CAL: Mr. Horace he got an attack. He's bad. Miss Regina says you stop that noise.

LEO: Uncle Horace—What— [Crosses U.C.]—What happened? [Cal starts down stairs. Cal shakes his head, begins to move swiftly L. off. Leo looks around wildly] But when—You seen Mr. Oscar or Mr. Ben? [Cal shakes his head. Moves on. Leo grabs him by the arm] Answer me, will you?

CAL: No ain't seen 'em. I ain't got time to answer you. [Cal breaks Leo's hold, crosses L.] I got to get things. [Cal exits]

LEO: But what's the matter with him? When did this happen——? [Crossing to door L., calling after Call You'd think Papa'd be some place where you could find him. I been chasing him all afternoon.

[Oscar and Ben come swiftly into the room, talking excitedly]

oscar: I hope it's not a bad attack.

BEN: It's the first one he's had since he come home.

[Leo crosses to Oscar, excitedly]

LEO: Papa, I've been looking all over town for you and Uncle Ben-

BEN: Where is he?

oscar: Addie said it was sudden.

BEN: [To Leo] Where is he? When did it happen? LEO: Upstairs. Will you listen to me, please? I been looking for you for——

OSCAR: [To Ben] You think we should go up? [Ben, looking up the steps, shakes his head]

BEN: I don't know. I don't know.

OSCAR: [Sharply—crossing D. to Leo] What is the matter with you?

LEO: [Coming to him] I been trying to tell you. I been trying to find you for an hour—oscar: Tell me what?

LEO: Uncle Horace knows about the bonds. He knows about them. He's had the box since Wednesday——

BEN: [Sharply] Stop shouting! [Crosses D.C. to him] What the hell are you talking about?

LEO: [Furiously. Crossing to Ben] I'm telling you he knows about the bonds. Ain't that clear enough——?

OSCAR: [Grabbing Leo's arm] You God damn fool! Stop screaming!

BEN: Now what happened? Talk quietly.

LEO: [Closes his eyes, angrily attempted patience] You heard me. Uncle Horace knows about the bonds. He's known since Wednesday.

BEN: [After a second. Oscar draws close to them] How do you know that?

LEO: Because Cal comes down to Mander and says the box came O. K. and——

OSCAR: [Trembling, crosses to Ben, pushing Leo away L.] That might not mean a thing—

LEO: [Angrily steps D. to L. of Oscar] No? It might not, huh? [Takes Oscar's arm. Oscar turns to him] Then he says Mander should come here tonight and bring Sol Fowler with him. [Ben crosses R. to R. of table] I guess that don't mean a thing either. [Leo turns—crosses D.L.]

OSCAR: [Panicky, to Ben] Ben—What—Do you think he's seen the—

BEN: [Motions to box] There's the box. [Both Oscar and Leo turn sharply. Leo makes a leap to the box, crossing R. back of Oscar, picks up box] You ass. Put it down. What are you going to do with it, eat it?

LEO: I'm going to— [Starts]

BEN: [Furiously] Put it down. Don't touch it again. Now sit down and shut up for a minute.

[Leo puts box down on table]

oscar: [Crossing to Leo] Since Wednesday. [To Leo] You said he had it since Wednesday. Why didn't he say something——[To Ben] I don't understand——

LEO: [Taking a step R.] I can put it back. I can put it back before anybody knows.

BEN: [Who is standing at the table R., softly] He's had it since Wednesday. Yet he hasn't said a word to us.

OSCAR: Why? Why?

LEO: What's the difference why? He was getting ready to say plenty. He was going to say it to Fowler tonight——

OSCAR: [Angrily] Be still. [Turns to Ben, looks at him, waits]

BEN: [After a moment] I don't believe that.

LEO: [Wildly, teaning toward Ben over table] You don't believe it? What do I care what you believe? I do the dirty work and then——

BEN: [Turning his head sharply to Leo] I'm remembering that. I'm remembering that, Leo.

OSCAR: [A step D.] What do you mean?

LEO: You-

BEN: [To Oscar] If you don't shut that little fool up, I'll show you what I mean. [Oscar makes a gesture at Leo. Leo crosses U.C.] For some reason he knows, but he don't say a word.

OSCAR: [Crossing to Ben] Maybe he didn't know that we—

BEN: [Quickly] That Leo——? [Crosses c.] He's no fool. [Crossing up to Leo] Does Mander know the bonds are missing?

LEO: How could I tell? I was half crazy. I don't think so. Because Mander seemed kind of puzzled and——

OSCAR: But we got to find out-

[He breaks off as Cal comes into the room carrying a kettle of hot water and clean cloths, leaving door open. They turn to Cal. Leo, startled, crosses U.L. to back settee]

BEN: [Crosses to above chair L.] How is he, Cal? CAL: I don't know, Mr. Ben. He was bad. [Going toward stairs

OSCAR: [Crosses L. to chair L.] But when did it happen?

CAL: [Shrugs] He wasn't feeling so bad early. [Addie comes in quickly from hall] Then there he is next thing on the landing, fallen over, his eyes tight -[He hurries toward stairs]

ADDIE: [To Cal] Dr. Sloan's over at the Ballongs. Hitch the buggy and go get him. [She takes kettle and cloths from him, pushes him, runs up stairs] Go on. [She disappears]

[Cal exits L., picking up his umbrella as he goes. Oscar crosses D.R.]

BEN: [Takes off coat and hat, places them on chair u.c.] Never seen Sloan anywhere when you need him.

OSCAR: [Softly] Sounds bad.

LEO: [Taking a step to Ben] He would have told her about it. Aunt Regina. He would have told his own wife-

BEN: [Turning to Leo] Yes, he might have told her. [Crossing, to front wheel-chair] But they weren't on such pretty terms and maybe he didn't. Maybe he didn't. [Goes quickly to Leo] Now, listen to me. If she doesn't know, it may work out all right. [Holding Leo's lapel] If she does know, you're to say he lent you the bonds.

LEO: Lent them to me! Who's going to believe that?

BEN: Nobody.

OSCAR: [To Leo, crossing to Ben] Don't you understand? It can't do no harm to say it--- [Ben releases grip on Leo's lapel]

LEO: Why should I say he lent them to me? Why not to you? [Carefully] Why not to Uncle Ben?

BEN: [Smiles] Just because he didn't lend them to me. Remember that.

LEO: But all he has to do is say he didn't lend them to me-

BEN: [Furiously] But for some reason, he doesn't seem to be talking, does he?

[There are footsteps above. They all stand looking at the stairs. Regina begins to come slowly down]

BEN: [Crosses U.R., to Regina] What happened? REGINA: He's had a bad attack. [Crosses D.C.]

OSCAR: Too bad. I'm so sorry we weren't here when-when Horace needed us.

BEN: [Crosses D.C.] When you needed us. REGINA: [At chair L.C. Looks at him] Yes. BEN: How is he? Can we—can we go up?

REGINA: [Shakes her head] He's not conscious. OSCAR: [Pacing around] It's that—it's that bad? [Turns, crosses D.R.] Wouldn't you think Sloan could be found quickly, just once, just once?

REGINA: I don't think there is much for him to do. BEN: [Crossing to Regina] Oh, don't talk like that. He's come through attacks before. He will now.

[Regina sits down, chair L.C. After a second she speaks softly. Leo crosses R. to above table R.1 REGINA: Well. We haven't seen each other since the day of our fight.

BEN: [Tenderly] That was nothing. Why, you and Oscar and I used to fight when we were kids.

OSCAR: [Hurriedly taking a step L.] Don't you think we should go up? Is there anything we can do for Horace-

BEN: You don't feel well. Ah-

REGINA: [Without looking at them] No, I don't. [Slight pause] Horace told me about the bonds this afternoon.

[There is an immediate shocked silence]

LEO: [Taking several short steps to L. of table R.] The bonds. What do you mean? What bonds? What----?

OSCAR: [Looks at him furiously. Then to Regina] The Union Pacific bonds? Horace's Union Pacific Bonds?

REGINA: Yes.

OSCAR: [Steps to her, very nervously] Well. Well what-what about them? What-what could he say? REGINA: He said that Leo had stolen the bonds and given them to you.

OSCAR: [Aghast, very loudly] That's ridiculous, Regina, absolutely-

LEO: I don't know what you're talking about. What would I-why-

REGINA: [Wearily to Ben] Isn't it enough that he stole them from me? Do I have to listen to this in the bargain?

oscar: You are talking-

LEO: I didn't steal anything. I don't know

REGINA: [To Ben] Would you ask them to stop that, please?

[There is silence for a minute. Ben glowers at Oscar and Leo, Leo looks at Oscar]

BEN: Aren't we starting at the wrong end, Regina? What did Horace tell you?

REGINA: [Smiles at him] He told me that Leo had stolen the bonds.

LEO: [To Ben] I didn't steal-

REGINA: Please. Let me finish. [Leo crosses R. slowly] Then he told me that he was going to pretend that he had lent them to you [Leo turns sharply to Regina, then looks at Oscar, then looks back at Reginal as a present from me to my brothers. He said there was nothing I could do about it. He said the rest of his money would go to Alexandra. That is all.

[There is a silence. Oscar coughs, Leo smiles slyly]

LEO: [Taking a step to her] I told you he had lent them-I could have told you-

REGINA: [Ignores him, smiles sadly at Ben] So I'm very badly off, you see. [Carefully] But Horace said there was nothing I could do about it as long as he was alive to say he had lent you the bonds.

BEN: You shouldn't feel that way. It can all be explained, all be adjusted. It isn't as bad——

REGINA: So you, at least, are willing to admit that the bonds were stolen?

BEN: [Oscar laughs nervously] I admit no such thing. It's possible that Horace made up that part of the story to tease you—— [Looks at her] Or perhaps to punish you. Punish you.

REGINA: [Sadly] It's not a pleasant story. I feel bad, Ben, naturally. I hadn't thought——

BEN: Now you shall have the bonds safely back. That was the understanding, wasn't it, Oscar?

OSCAR: [Crossing to C.] Yes.

REGINA: I'm glad to know that. [Smiles] Ah, I had greater hopes——

BEN: Don't talk that way. That's foolish. [Looks at his watch] I think we ought to drive out for Sloan ourselves. [Looks at Oscar] If we can't find him we'll go over to Senateville for Doctor Morris. [Looks at her. Oscar crosses U. to chair R.C. for hat, Leo crosses U. back of sofa to hall, picking up hat] And don't think I'm dismissing this other business. I'm not. We'll have it all out on a more appropriate day.

[Ben crosses U. to chair U.C. for coat and hat] REGINA: [Waits until they are near the door. Looks up, quietly] I don't think you had better go yet. I think you had better stay and sit down. [Oscar crosses to half]

BEN: [Picking up coat and hat] We'll be back with Sloan.

REGINA: Cal has gone for him. I don't want you to go.

[Oscar turns, looks at them]

BEN: [Crossing U.C.] Now don't worry and REGINA: You will come back in this room and sit down. I have something more to say.

[Leo steps back into view]

BEN: [Turns, comes toward her to c.] Since when do I take orders from you?

REGINA: [Smiles] You don't—yet. [Oscar takes a step in. Sharply] Come back, Oscar. You too, Leo. OSCAR: [Takes another step in. Sure of himself, laughs] My dear Regina——

BEN: [Crosses to her. Softly, pats her hand] Horace has already clipped your wings and very wittily. Do I have to clip them, too? [Smiles at her] You'd get farther with a smile, Regina. I'm a soft man for a woman's smile.

REGINA: I'm smiling, Ben. I'm smiling because you are quite safe while Horace lives. But I don't think Horace will live. [Leo looks at Oscar. To Ben] And if he doesn't live I shall want seventy-five per cent in exchange for the bonds.

BEN: [Steps back. Whistles, laughs] Greedy! What a greedy girl you are! You want so much of everything.

REGINA: Yes. And if I don't get what I want I am going to put all three of you in jail.

OSCAR: [Crosses L. to R. of Regina, furiously] You're mighty crazy. Having just admitted—— [Leo steps D.]

BEN: And on what evidence would you put Oscar and Leo in jail?

REGINA: [Laughs, gaily] Oscar, listen to him. He's getting ready to swear that it was you and Leo! What do you say to that? [As Oscar turns furiously toward Ben] Oh, don't be angry, Oscar. I'm going to see that he goes in with you.

[Oscar turns, steps U.C.]

BEN: Try anything you like, Regina. [Steps to Regina. Oscar crosses U.R. Sharply] And now we can stop all this and say goodbye to you. [Alexandra comes into view on landing, moving slowly down steps] It's his money and he's obviously willing to let us borrow it. [More pleasantly. Leo slowly crosses U. to hall] Learn to make threats when you can carry them through: for how many years have I told you a good-looking woman gets more by being soft and appealing? Mama used to tell you that. [Looks at his watch] Where the hell is Sloan? [To Oscar] Take the buggy and——

[As Ben turns to Oscar, he sees Alexandra and stops. Oscar turns to her. Alexandra has come slowly down the steps. She walks stiffly. She comes down as if she did not see any of them. She goes slowly to lower window, her head bent. They all turn to look at her]

OSCAR: [After a second, moving toward her above sofa] What? Alexandra——

[She does not answer. After a second Addie comes slowly down the stairs, moving as if she were very tired. At foot of steps, she looks at Alexandra, then turns and slowly crosses to door L. and exits. Regina rises. She sees Addie. Ben looks nervously at Alexandra, at Regina]

OSCAR: [As Addie passes him, irritably to Alexandra] Well, what is— [Turns into room—sees Addie at foot of steps] what's?—[Ben puts up a hand, shakes his head. His movements become nervous and fidgety, as if he were anxious to get out. Oscar clears his throat, looks at Regina, tries to fill the silence. Leo steps D.] My God, I didn't know—who could have known—I didn't know he was that sick. Well, well—I—

[Regina stands quietly, her back to them]

BEN: [Softly, sincerely] Seems like yesterday when he first came here.

[Places coat and hat on chair above wheelchair] OSCAR: [Sincerely, nervously] Yes, that's true. [Turns to Ben] The whole town loved him and respected him.

ALEXANDRA: [Turns and crosses to below sofa R.] Did you love him, Uncle Oscar?

oscar: [Turns to Alexandra] Certainly, I—What a strange thing to ask? I——

ALEXANDRA: [Turns to look at Ben] Did you love him. Uncle Ben?

BEN: [Simply] He had-

ALEXANDRA: [Suddenly starts to laugh very loudly] And you, Mama, did you love him, too?

REGINA: I know what you feel, Alexandra, but please try to control yourself.

ALEXANDRA: [Still laughing] I'm trying, Mama. I'm trying very hard.

BEN: Grief makes some people laugh and some people cry. It's better to cry, Alexandra.

ALEXANDRA: [The laugh has stopped. Tensely. Moves toward Regina, crossing to front sofa] What was Papa doing on the staircase?

REGINA: [Crossing R. to Alexandra. Ben turns to look at Alexandra with interest] Please go and lie down, my dear. We all need time to get over shocks like this. [Alexandra does not move. Regina's voice becomes softer, more insistent] Please go, Alexandra.

ALEXANDRA: No, Mama. I'll wait. I've got to talk to you.

REGINA: Later. Go and rest now.

ALEXANDRA: [Quietly] I'll wait, Mama. I've plenty of time. [Sits down on sofa] All my life.

REGINA: [Hesitates, stares, makes a half shrug, turns back to Ben, crossing L. to c.] As I was saying. Tomorrow morning I am going up to Judge Simmes. I shall tell him about Leo.

to stay. [Turns to him. Sharply] I didn't ask her to stay. [Turns away, crossing L.] Tomorrow morning I go to Judge Simmes—

OSCAR: And what proof? What proof of all this----

REGINA: [Turns, crosses to c. between Ben and Oscar. To Oscar sharply] None. I won't need any. The bonds are missing and they are with Marshall. That will be enough. If it isn't, I'll add what's necessary.

BEN: I'm sure of that.

REGINA: [Turns to Ben] You can be quite sure.

oscar: We'll deny-

REGINA: Deny your heads off. You couldn't find a jury that wouldn't weep for a woman whose brothers steal from her. And you couldn't find twelve men in this State you haven't cheated and hate you for it.

OSCAR: What kind of talk is this? You couldn't do anything like that! We're your own brothers. How can you talk that way when upstairs not five minutes ago—[Points up stairs]

REGINA: [Slowly] There are people who can never go back, who must finish what they start. I am one of those people, Oscar. [After a slight pause, turns back to Ben, almost teasingly] Where was I? [Smiles at Ben] Well, they'll convict you. But I won't care much if they don't. [Leans forward, pleasantly] Because by that time you'll be ruined. [Crosses D.L.] I shall also tell my story to Mr. Marshall, who likes me, I think, and who will not want to be involved in your scandal. A respectable firm like Marshall & Company! The deal would be off in an hour. [Turns to them angrily] And you know it. Now I don't want to hear any more from any of you. You'll do no more bargaining in this house. I'll take my seventy-five per cent and we'll forget the story forever. That's one way of doing it, and the way I prefer. [Crosses to settee L.] You know me well enough to know that I don't mind taking the other way. [Sits down on settee]

BEN: [After a second, slowly, at chair L.C.] None of us have ever known you well enough, Regina.

REGINA: You're getting old, Ben. Your tricks aren't as smart as they used to be. [There is no answer. She waits, then smiles] All right. I take it that's settled and I get what I asked for.

oscar: [Furiously to Ben] Are you going to let her do this——?

BEN: [Turns to look at him, slowly] You have a suggestion?

REGINA: [Puts her arms above her head, stretches, laughs] No, he hasn't. All right. Now, Leo, I have forgotten that you ever saw the bonds. [Archly, to Ben and Oscar] And as long as you boys both behave yourselves, I've forgotten that we ever talked about them. You can draw up the necessary papers tomorrow.

[Ben laughs. Leo stares at him, starts for door. Exits. Oscar moves toward door, angrily. Regina looks at Ben, nods, laughs with him. For a second, Oscar stands in the door, looking back at them. Then he exits]

REGINA: You're a good loser, Ben. I like that.

BEN: [He picks up his coat, then turns to her] Well, I say to myself, what's the good? You and I aren't like Oscar. We're not sour people. I think that comes from a good digestion. [Putting on coat] Then, too, one loses today and wins tomorrow. I say to myself, years of planning and I get what I want. Then I don't get it. But I'm not discouraged. The century's turning, the world is open. Open for people like you and me. Ready for us, waiting for us. After all, this is just the beginning. [Crosses L. to above chair L.C.] There are hundreds of Hubbards sitting in rooms like this throughout the country. All their names aren't Hubbard, but they are all Hubbards and they will own this country some day. We'll get along.

REGINA: [Smiles] I think so.

BEN: [Crosses to chair, picks up hat] Then, too, I say to myself, things may change. [Looks at Alexandra] I agree with Alexandra. [Looks up at landing] What is a man in a wheel chair doing on a staircase? I ask myself that.

REGINA: [Looks up at him] And what do you answer?

BEN: I have no answer. [Crosses L. to back of settee] But maybe some day I will. Maybe never, but maybe some day. [Smiles. Patting her arm] When I do, I'll let you know. [Crosses to C., toward half]

REGINA: [As he turns for door] When you do, write me. I will be in Chicago. [Gaily] Ah, Ben, if Papa had only left me his money.

BEN: I'll see you tomorrow. [Crosses R. to above wheel chair]

REGINA: Oh, yes. Certainly. You'll be sort of working for me now.

BEN: [Turns, crosses to above sofa R., looks at Alexandra, smiles at her] Alexandra, you're turning out to be a right interesting girl. [Looks at Regina] Well, goodnight, all. [He exits]

REGINA: [Sits quietly for a second, stretches, turns to look at Alexandra] What do you want to talk to me about, Alexandra?

ALEXANDRA: [Slowly] I've changed my mind. I don't want to talk. There's nothing to talk about now.

REGINA: You're acting very strange. Not like yourself. You've had a bad shock today. I know that. And you loved Papa, but you must have expected this to come someday. You knew how sick he was.

ALEXANDRA: I knew. We all knew.

REGINA: It will be good for you to get away from here. Good for me, too. Time heals most wounds, Alexandra. You're young, you shall have all the things I wanted. I'll make the world for you the way I wanted it to be for me. [Uncomfortably] Don't sit there staring. You've been around Birdie so much you're getting just like her.

ALEXANDRA: [Nods] Funny. That's what Aunt Birdie said today.

REGINA: [Nods] Be good for you to get away from all this.

[Addie enters]

ADDIE: Cal is back, Miss Regina. He says Dr. Sloan will be coming in a few minutes.

REGINA: We'll go in a few weeks. A few weeks! That means two or three Saturdays, two or three Sundays. [Sighs] Well. I'm very tired. I shall go to bed. I don't want any supper. Put the lights out and lock up. [Addie moves to the piano lamp, turns it out] You go to your room, Alexandra. Addie will bring you something hot. You look very tired. [Rises, crosses u.c. To Addie] Call me when Dr. Sloan gets here. I don't want to see anybody else. I don't want any condolence calls tonight. The whole town will be over.

ALEXANDRA: Mama, I'm not coming with you. I'm not going to Chicago.

REGINA: [Turns, to her] You're very upset, Alexandra.

ALEXANDRA: [Quietly] I mean what I say. With all my heart.

REGINA: [Quietly] We'll talk about it tomorrow. The morning will make a difference.

ALEXANDRA: It won't make any difference. And there isn't anything to talk about. I am going away from you. Because I want to. Because I know Papa would want me to.

REGINA: [Puzzled, careful, polite] You know your Papa wanted you to go away from me?

ALEXANDRA: Yes.

REGINA: [Softly] And if I say no?

ALEXANDRA: [Looks at her, firmly] Say it, Mama, say it. And see what happens.

REGINA: [Softly, after a pause] And if I make you stay?

ALEXANDRA: That would be foolish. It wouldn't work in the end.

REGINA: You're very serious about it, aren't you? [Crosses to steps—up two steps] Well, you'll change your mind in a few days.

ALEXANDRA: You only change your mind when you want to. And I won't want to.

REGINA: [Going up steps] Alexandra, I've come to the end of my rope. [On 5th step] Somewhere there has to be what I want, too. Life goes too fast. Do what you want; think what you want; go where you want. I'd like to keep you with me, but I won't make you stay. Too many people used to make me do too many things. No. [Going up to landing] I won't make you stay.

ALEXANDRA: You couldn't, Mama, because I want to leave here. As I've never wanted anything in my life before. Because I understand what Papa was trying to tell me. [Pause] All in one day: Addie said there were people who ate the earth and other people who stood around and watched them do it. And just now Uncle Ben said the same thing. Really, he said the same thing. [Tensely] Well, tell him for me, Mama, I'm not going to stand around and watch you do it. Tell him I'll be fighting as hard as he'll be fighting [Rises, steps U. to table] someplace where people don't just stand around and watch.

REGINA: Well, you have spirit, after all. I used to think you were all sugar water. We don't have to be bad friends. I don't want us to be bad friends, Alexandra. [Starts off, stops, turns to Alexandra] Would you like to come and talk to me, Alexandra? Would you—would you like to sleep in my room tonight?

ALEXANDRA: [Takes a step toward her] Are you afraid, Mama?

[Regina does not answer, but moves slowly out of sight. Addie then comes to Alexandra, squeezes her arm with affection and pride, then starts for the other lamp, as

THE CURTAIN FALLS]

William Saroyan

(1908 - - - - -)

When William Saroyan made his strange debut as a playwright, in the spring of 1939, he was already well known as an original short-story writer. He had brought out five collections of stories, had expressed notably uninhibited opinions on art and life, and had announced himself as the only original genius in the land. Since the appearance of his first collection, The Daring Young Man on the Flying Trapeze and Other Stories (1934), moreover, a number of critics had been willing to accept him at his own high estimation.

Saroyan was born of Armenian parentage in Fresno, California, and was educated at a Fresno grammar school, where he was anything but a model pupil. He started knocking about at an early age, with scant preparation for success other than a buoyant disposition and a vast amount of curiosity about everything except intellectual matters. For a time he worked as a Western Union messenger boy, a roving occupation that evidently pleased him a good deal, for he was fond of returning to this experience in his reminiscences. He also performed odd chores in the neighborhood and worked for a while in his uncle's vineyard. Then, at the age of seventeen, he left Fresno "for some of the rest of the world," as he declared, and simply decided that he was a writer. Taking as his subjects himself and the people he knew, he began to produce generally disorganized but surprisingly fresh stories. The Daring Young Man on the Flying Trapeze, a tale of a young writer's starvation-induced delirium, was published in the February 1934 issue of Story magazine and received instant acclaim. Since this was all the encouragement Saroyan needed, he proceeded to turn out enough stories at lightning speed to have a volume ready for publication later that year.

For Saroyan, who had not studied writing but had read voluminously and indiscriminately, literary composition (and later on, playwriting) held no mysteries. His rules, the first of which he claimed to have discovered at the age of eleven, were: "Do not pay attention to the rules other people make. ... Forget everybody who ever wrote anything. . . . Learn to typewrite, so you can turn out stories as fast as Zane Grey." As for playwriting, his considered advice to the young was not to take George Pierce Baker's course at Harvard but to look at the world, to write a great deal without ever being careful, and never to try to achieve a style, "because style is something which is there from the beginning and doesn't have to be achieved." A playwright's sole aim should be "to uncover the magnificent and unending drama in the most ordinary environments, events, and people."

The theatre had attracted Saroyan from his earliest years, but it was the theatricality of the dramatic arts, the showmanship and the excitements of the stage, that absorbed him. "I take pride," he wrote later, "in my having sneaked into every theatre in my home town . . . ; into every circus that came to town; into the County Fairs; into the Summer stock company shows." Vaudeville fascinated him especially, and it had a decisive influence on his playwriting. What effort he made to acquaint himself with the literary drama left him unimpressed. Lady Windermere's Fan, read when he was fourteen, had worldly and brilliant style, but "didn't seem right" for him. His world, he realized early, "was a world of plain and poor people, broken-down houses, casualness, good health, poverty, and uproarious laughter." Copies of Ibsen's Ghosts and of other plays by "that great and magnificently dull dramatist" were apparently available to the boy. But Ibsen drama had no effect on him, because it was "too cagey, crafty, and calculating." He liked vaudeville much better. It was "easygoing and didn't try for too much and as a result very often achieved things Ibsen himself couldn't achieve. Vaudeville was American, too, which made a great difference,'

Like vaudeville, Saroyan's plays were briskly spontaneous, disjointed, and improvisatory. He did not actually cultivate "surrealism." A freedom from the reins of practical reality and normal logic characterized most of his work; a madcap fancy, combined with indefinable intimations, ran riot in it: and the plays, composed at incredible speed, sometimes gave the impression of having come from their author almost automatically. (The French surrealists, we may recall, stressed "automatic writing.") In these respects, Saroyan's plays can be called "surrealist" and they are, indeed, the best representation of this modern style in English-language drama. But Saroyan's writing was native and impulsive rather than borrowed and learned; it was definitely not patterned after the subjective style of the French cult. Vaudeville exerted the most considerable influence in his work. For Saroyan, his kind of sketchy writing was "realistic," in the sense that he did not contrive it but set down what he saw or impulsively felt.

Saroyan's first play was Subway Circus (1935); it was a collection of scenes conveying people's day-dreams, connected only by the circumstance that the characters happen to be riding in the subway.

Next, in 1938, he dramatized his short story The Man with the Heart in the Highlands for William Kozlenko's One-Act Play Magazine, under the title My Heart's in the Highlands. Kozlenko scheduled it for production by his short-lived One-Act Play Theatre. Subsequently, the author enlarged the then very short play and the Group Theatre produced it on April 13, 1939, with an excellent score by Paul Bowles, an enchanting semisurrealistic setting by Herbert Andrews, and superb direction by Robert Lewis. The newspaper critics were violently divided in their opinion, but Saroyan found powerful champions in Brooks Atkinson, John Mason Brown, and George Jean Nathan. The play, which had originally been scheduled by the Group for four experimental performances, was thereupon taken over by the Theatre Guild and presented to its membership.

Encouraged to continue playwriting, Saroyan completed his first full-length play, The Time of Your Life, in six days of furious writing. It was produced in the fall of 1939 by Eddie Dowling and the Theatre Guild, ran the greater part of the season in New York, toured extensively, and won both the Drama Critics Circle award and the Pulitzer Prize. In the spring of 1940, Dowling and the Theatre Guild produced a second full-length play by Saroyan, Love's Old Sweet Song, a somewhat more conventional drama that proved less successful. In 1941, using the income he had earned from The Time of Your Life, Saroyan acted as his own producer, as well as director, and gave New York the strangely beautiful, if somewhat chaotic, fantasy The Beautiful People. In 1941 too, the National Theatre Conference released his wildly fantastic Jim Dandy to sixty of its college and community-theatre affiliates. Eddie Dowling used the remarkable one-act play Hello, Out There as a curtain raiser in 1942, and in 1943 George Abbott staged Saroyan's travesty on Hollywood, Get Away Old Man, written out of the author's experience on the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer lot. A number of other, rather loosely written and confusing plays of his also managed to be produced. Among these were Sweeney in the Trees, which the author described as "anything you like, whatever you please," and Across the Board on Tomorrow Morning, a mystical piece which he arranged to have played twice in the same evening at the Pasadena Playhouse, for any playgoers who wanted to see it a second time!

After 1943, Saroyan plays had few productions, none of them on Broadway; but the prolific writer continued to turn out script after script. Two of these (Afton Water and the war play A Decent Birth, a Happy Funeral) were singularly touching, although faulty. A few plays written after the war, especially the depressing Don't Go Away Mad, continued to reveal an original talent, although they showed plainly that their author had never bothered to learn the craft of playwriting. War service as a private had exerted an unfortunate effect on Saroyan's individualistic personality, inspiring a bitter novel, The Adventures of Wesley Jackson (he had previously written a charming autobiography, My Name Is Aram, and a loose novel, The Human Comedy), and depressing his playwriting, which had depended hitherto on buoyancy for success in the theatre.

My Heart's in the Highlands is the simplest and perhaps the best example of Saroyan's style of playwriting. It is free from the excesses of much of his later work. Moreover, it retains an undivided effect, whereas some of the best of his other plays, such as The Time of Your Life and Love's Old Sweet Song, demand constant adjustment on our part to an alternation of probabilities and improbabilities. Except for a few maladroit passages, My Heart's in the Highlands is written in a single vein as a work of inviolable innocence. Although the author's innocence does not exclude the realities of poverty and of old age, the play is a paean to man's impulsive love of beauty, to kindliness and dignity among the obscure, and to the wondering faith that children reveal. The play is sentimental without apology and optimistic without reason-attributes which, incidentally, Saroyan would claim for the greater part of the human race. "The fable of a tenth-rate poet whose protective little boy worships him as a genius," as George Jean Nathan called it, appeals more readily to the heart than to the mind. "There is more human pressure per square foot in it," another reviewer declared, "than in acres of sensible drama."

Perhaps the entire question of sense or nonsense in My Heart's in the Highlands is, indeed, altogether irrelevant beside Saroyan's feeling for people and for sheer existence. The play expresses a diffuse Whitmanesque spirit, a poetic caprice that requires no more explanations than does the taste of food and drink. Nothing and everything is in this play. And this is also true of the writing, which has no particular distinction other than that of being alive. The thoughts uttered by the characters are less important than those they do not or are unable to put into words. For all its simplicity, My Heart's in the Highlands therefore demands considerable empathy and theatrical imagination, and argument about it leads nowhere. We like the play insofar as we experience it; we dislike it insofar as we do not experience it.

THE PLACE

A house on San Benito Avenue in Fresno, California. Mr. Kosak's grocery store.

THE TIME

August and November, 1914

An old white, broken-down, frame house with a front porch, on San Benito Avenue in Fresno, California. There are no other houses near by, only a desolation of bleak land and red sky. It is late afternoon of a day in August, 1914. The evening sun is going down.

Johnny, aged nine, but essentially ageless, is sitting, dynamic and acrobatic, on the steps of the porch, dead to the world and deep in thought of a high and holy order. Far away a train whistle cries mournfully. He listens eagerly, cocking his head on one side like a chicken, trying to understand the meaning of the cry and at the same time to figure out everything. He doesn't quite make it and when the cry ends he stops being eager. A fourteen-yearold boy on a bicycle, eating an ice-cream cone and carrying newspaper bags, goes by on the sidewalk in silence, oblivious of the weight on his shoulders and of the contraption on which he is seated, because of the delight and glory of ice cream in the world. Johnny leaps to his feet and waves to the boy, smiling in a big humanitarian way, but is ignored. He sits down again and listens to a small overjoyed but angry bird. After making a brief forceful speech of no meaning, the bird flies away.

From inside the house is heard the somber voice of Johnny's Father reciting poetry of his own composition.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: The long silent day journeys through the sore solemn heart, and—[Bitter pause] And—[Quickly] The long silent day journeys through the sore solemn heart, and-[Pause] No. [He roars and begins again] Crippled and weeping, time stumbles through the lone lorn heart.

[A table or chair is pushed over in anger. A groan. Silence. The boy listens. He gets up and tries to stand on his head, fails, tries again, fails, tries again, and succeeds. While he is standing on his head he hears the loveliest and most amazing music in the world: a solo on a bugle. The music is "My Heart's in the Highlands." The bugler, a very old man, finishes the solo in front of the house. The boy leaps to his feet and runs up to the old man, amazed. delighted and bewildered

JOHNNY: I sure would like to hear you play another song.

MAC GREGOR: Young man, could you get a glass of water for an old man whose heart is not here, but in the highlands?

JOHNNY: What highlands?

MAC GREGOR: The Scotch Highlands. Could you? JOHNNY: What's your heart doing in the Scotch Highlands?

MAC GREGOR: My heart's grieving there. Could you get me a glass of cool water?

JOHNNY: Where's your mother?

MAC GREGOR: [Inventing for the boy] My mother's in Tulsa, Oklahoma, but her heart isn't.

JOHNNY: Where is her heart?

MAC GREGOR: [Loud] In the Scotch Highlands. [Soft] I'm very thirsty, young man.

JOHNNY: How come the members of your family are always leaving their hearts in the highlands?

MAC GREGOR: [In the Shakespearean manner] That's the way we are. Here today and gone to-morrow.

JOHNNY: [Aside] Here today and gone tomorrow? [To MacGregor] How do you figure?

MAC GREGOR: [The philosopher] Alive one minute and dead the next.

JOHNNY: Where's your mother's mother?

MAC GREGOR: [Inventing, but angry] She's up in Vermont, in a little town called White River, but her heart isn't.

JOHNNY: Is her poor old withered heart in the highlands, too?

MAC GREGOR: Right smack in the highlands. Son, I'm dying of thirst.

[Johnny's Father comes out of the house in a fury, as if he has just broken out of a cage, and roars at the boy like a tiger that has just awakened from evil dreams]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Johnny, get the hell away from that poor old man. Get him a pitcher of water before he falls down and dies. Where the hell are your manners?

JOHNNY: Can't a fellow try to find out something from a traveler once in a while?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Get the old man some water, God damn it. Don't stand there like a dummy. Get him a drink, I tell you, before he falls down and dies

JOHNNY: You get him a drink. You're not doing anything.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Not doing anything? Why, Johnny, you know I'm getting a new poem arranged in my mind.

JOHNNY: How do you figure I know? You're just standing there on the porch with your sleeves rolled up.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Angry] Well, you ought to know. [Roaring] You're my son. [Amazed] If you shouldn't know, who should?

MAC GREGOR: [Blithely] Good afternoon. Your son has been telling me how clear and cool the climate is in these parts.

JOHNNY: [Bewildered, but eager to learn. Aside] Holy Moses, I didn't say anything about the climate. Where's he getting that stuff from?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [The aristocrat, grandly] How do you do? Won't you come in for a little rest? We should be honored to have you at our table for a bit of supper.

MAC GREGOR: [The realist] Sir, I'm starving. I shall come right in. [He moves to enter the house. Johnny gets in his way, looking up at him]

JOHNNY: [The romantic] Can you play "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes"? I sure would like to hear you play that song on the bugle. That song is my favorite. I guess I like that song better than any song in the world.

MAC GREGOR: [The disillusioned] Son, when you get to be my age you'll know songs aren't important, bread's the thing.

JOHNNY: [The faithful] Anyway, I sure would like to hear you play that song.

[MacGregor goes up on the porch and shakes hands with Johnny's Father]

MAC GREGOR: [History in the making] My name is Jasper MacGregor. I am an actor.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Delighted] I'm mighty glad to make your acquaintance. [The imperial giver of orders] Johnny, get Mr. MacGregor a pitcher of water. [Johnny runs around the house]

MAC GREGOR: [Dying of thirst, sighing, but telling the truth nevertheless] Charming boy.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Ordinary statement] Like myself, he's a genius.

MAC GREGOR: [Roaring from fatigue] I suppose you're very fond of him?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Delighted to be alive] We are the same person— He is the heart of my youth—Have you noticed his eagerness?

MAC GREGOR: [Delighted to be still alive] I should say I have.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Proudly and with anger] I'm the same way myself, although older and less brilliant

[Johnny, running, returns with a pitcher of water which he hands to the old man. The old man throws back his shoulders, lifts his head, his nostrils expand, he snorts, his eyes widen, he lifts the pitcher of water to his lips and drinks all the water in one long swig, while Johnny and his Father watch with amazement and admiration. The old man breathes deeply, looks around at the landscape and up at the sky and to the end of San Benito Avenue where the evening sun is going down]

MAC GREGOR: [Reflection, sadly; weariness, softly] I reckon I'm five thousand miles from home. Do you think we could eat a little bread and cheese to keep my body and spirit together?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Napoleon] Johnny, run down to the grocer's and get a loaf of French bread and a pound of cheese.

JOHNNY: [The voice of doom] Give me the money.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Statistics, poetic, with pride] You know I haven't got a penny, Johnny. Tell Mr. Kosak to give us credit.

JOHNNY: [The unwilling dutiful son] He won't do it. He's tired of giving us credit. He says we don't work and never pay our bills. We owe him forty cents.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Impatient, irritated] Go on down there and argue it out with him. You know that's your job.

JOHNNY: [Defending his rights] He won't listen to reason. He says he doesn't know anything about anything. All he wants is the forty cents.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Napoleon] Go on down there and make him give you a loaf of bread and a pound of cheese. [Gently, pleading, flattering] You can do it, Johnny.

MAC GREGOR: [Impatient and hungry] Go on down there and tell Mr. Kosak to give you a loaf of bread and a pound of cheese, son.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Go ahead, Johnny. You've never failed to leave that store with something or other. You'll be back here in ten minutes with food fit for a King. [For his own amusement] Or at least a Duke of some kind.

JOHNNY: I don't know. Mr. Kosak says we are trying to give him the merry run-around. He wants to know what kind of work you do.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Furiously] Well, go ahead and tell him. [The hero] I have nothing to conceal. I write poetry, night and day.

JOHNNY: [Giving in at last] All right, but I don't think he'll be impressed. He says you never go out and look for work. He says you're lazy and no good.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Roaring] You go down there and tell that great-hearted Slovak he's crazy, Johnny. You go on down there and tell that splendid scholar and gentleman your father is one of the greatest unknown poets living.

JOHNNY: He won't care, Pa, but I'll go. I'll do my best. Haven't we got anything in the house?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Mock-tragically, roaring] Only popcorn. [To MacGregor] We've been eating popcorn four days in a row now. Johnny, you've got to get bread and cheese if you expect me to finish that long poem.

JOHNNY: I'll do my best.

MAC GREGOR: Don't take too long, Johnny. I'm five thousand miles from home.

JOHNNY: I'll run all the way, Mr. MacGregor.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [For the amusement of the good Lord] If you find any money on the way, remember we go fifty-fifty.

JOHNNY: [Delighted with the comedy] All right, Pa. [Johnny runs down the street]

The inside of Mr. Kosak's Grocery Store. Mr. Kosak is sleeping on his folded arms when Johnny runs into the store. Mr. Kosak lifts his head. He is a fine, gentle, serious man with a big, blond, old-fashioned mustache. He shakes his head trying to waken.

JOHNNY: [The diplomat, as it were] Mr. Kosak, if you were in China and didn't have a friend in the world and no money, you'd expect somebody over there to give you a pound of rice, wouldn't you?

MR. KOSAK: What do you want?

JOHNNY: I just want to talk a little. You'd expect some member of the Aryan race to help you out a little, wouldn't you, Mr. Kosak?

MR. KOSAK: How much money you got?

JOHNNY: It's not a question of money, Mr. Kosak. I'm talking about being in China.

MR. KOSAK: I don't know nothing about nothing. JOHNNY: How would you feel in China that way, Mr. Kosak?

MR. KOSAK: I don't know, Johnny. What would I be doing in China?

JOHNNY: Well, you'd be visiting there. You'd be hungry and five thousand miles from home and not a friend in the world. You wouldn't expect everybody to turn you away without even a pound of rice, would you, Mr. Kosak?

MR. KOSAK: I guess not, but you ain't in China, Johnny, and neither is your Pa. You or your Pa's got to go out and work sometime in your lives, so you might as well start now. I ain't going to give you no more groceries on credit because I know you won't pay me.

JOHNNY: Mr. Kosak, you misunderstand me. This is 1914, not 1913. I'm not talking about a few groceries. I'm talking about all them heathen people around you in China and you hungry and dying.

MR. KOSAK: This ain't China. You got to go out and make your living in this country. Everybody's got to work in America.

JOHNNY: Mr. Kosak, suppose it was a loaf of bread and a pound of cheese you needed to keep you alive in the world, would you hesitate to ask a Christian missionary for these things?

MR. KOSAK: Yes, I would. I would be ashamed to ask.

JOHNNY: Even if you knew you would give him back two loaves of bread and two pounds of cheese instead of one loaf and one pound? Even then, Mr. Kosak?

MR. KOSAK: Even then.

JOHNNY: Don't be that way, Mr. Kosak. That's defeatist talk, and you know it. Why, the only thing that would happen to you would be death. You'd die out there in China, Mr. Kosak.

MR. KOSAK: I wouldn't care if I would. You and your Pa have got to pay for bread and cheese. Why don't your Pa go out and get a job?

JOHNNY: [Swift abandonment of the intellectual attack for the human one] Mr. Kosak, how are you? MR. KOSAK: I'm fine, Johnny. How are you?

JOHNNY: Couldn't be better, Mr. Kosak. How are the children?

MR. KOSAK: They're all fine, Johnny. Stephan is beginning to walk now.

JOHNNY: That's great. How's Angela?

MR. KOSAK: Angela's beginning to sing. How's your Grandmother?

JOHNNY: She's fine. She's beginning to sing too. She says she'd rather be an opera singer than Queen of England. How's your wife Martha, Mr. Kosak?

MR. KOSAK: Oh, swell.

JOHNNY: I can't tell you how glad I am to hear that everything is fine at your house. I know Stephan is going to be a great man some day.

MR. KOSAK: I hope so. I'm going to send him to high school and see that he gets every chance I didn't get. I don't want him to have trouble all his life, too.

JOHNNY: I have great faith in Stephan, Mr. Kosak.

MR. KOSAK: What do you want, Johnny, and how much money you got?

JOHNNY: Mr. Kosak, you know I didn't come here to buy anything. You know I enjoy a quiet philosophical chat with you every now and then. [Quickly, pleading] Let me have a loaf of French bread and a pound of cheese.

MR. KOSAK: You got to pay cash, Johnny.

JOHNNY: And Esther? How is your beautiful daughter Esther?

MR. KOSAK: She's all right, Johnny, but you got to pay cash. You and your Pa are the worst citizens in this county.

JOHNNY: I'm glad Esther's all right, Mr. Kosak. Jasper MacGregor is visiting our house. He's a great actor.

MR. KOSAK: Never heard of him.

JOHNNY: And a bottle of beer for Mr. MacGregor.

MR. KOSAK: I can't give you a bottle of beer.

JOHNNY: Sure, you can.

MR. KOSAK: I can't. I'll let you have one loaf of French bread and a pound of cheese, but that's all. What kind of work does your Pa do when he works, Johnny?

JOHNNY: My father writes poetry, Mr. Kosak. That's the only work my father does. He's one of the greatest writers of poetry in the world.

MR. KOSAK: When does he get any money?

JOHNNY: He never gets any money. You can't have your cake and eat it too.

MR. KOSAK: I don't like that kind of work. Why doesn't your Pa work like everybody else, Johnny?

JOHNNY: He works harder than everybody else. My father works twice as hard as the average man.

[Mr. Kosak hands Johnny a loaf of French bread and a pound of cheese]

MR. KOSAK: Well, that's fifty-five cents you owe me, Johnny. I'll let you have some stuff this time, but never again.

JOHNNY: [At the door] Tell Esther I love her. [Johnny runs out of the store. Mr. Kosak swings at a fly, misses, swings again, misses, and, objecting to the world in this manner, he chases the fly all around the store, swinging with all his might]

The house. Johnny's Father and the old man are looking down the street to see if Johnny is coming back with food. His Grandmother is standing on the porch also eager to know if there is to be food.

MAC GREGOR: I think he's got some food with him.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [With pride] Of course he has.

[He waves at the old lady on the porch who runs into the house to set the table. Johnny runs to his Father and MacGregor] I knew you'd do it.

MAC GREGOR: So did I.

JOHNNY: He says we got to pay him fifty-five cents. He says he's not going to give us any more stuff on credit.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: That's his opinion. What did you talk about?

JOHNNY: First I talked about being hungry and at death's door in China. Then I inquired about the family.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: How is everyone?

JOHNNY: Fine. I didn't find any money, though. Not even a penny.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Oh, that's all right. Money isn't everything. [They go into the house]

The living room. They are all at the table after supper. MacGregor finds crumbs here and there which he places delicately in his mouth. He looks around the room to see if there isn't something more to eat.

MAC GREGOR: That green can up there, Johnny. What's in there?

JOHNNY: Marbles.

MAC GREGOR: That cupboard, Johnny. Anything edible in there?

JOHNNY: Crickets.

MAC GREGOR: That big jar in the corner there, Johnny. What's delectable in there?

JOHNNY: I got a gopher snake in that jar.

MAC GREGOR: Well, I could go for a bit of boiled gopher snake in a big way, Johnny.

JOHNNY: [Defiantly, protector of animals] Nothing doing, Mr. MacGregor.

MAC GREGOR: Why not, Johnny? Why the hell not, son? I hear of fine Borneo natives eating snakes and grasshoppers. You haven't got a half dozen fat grasshoppers around, have you, Johnny?

JOHNNY: Only four.

MAC GREGOR: Well, trot them out, son, and after we've had our fill, I'll play "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes" for you. I'm mighty hungry, Johnny.

JOHNNY: So am I, but I don't want anybody killing them innocent animals. They got rights the same as anybody else.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [To MacGregor] How about a little music? I think the boy would be delighted.

JOHNNY: [Leaping to his feet] I sure would, Mr. MacGregor.

MAC GREGOR: All right, Johnny. Bread. Bread. My God, how savagely it quarrels with the heart. [MacGregor gets up and begins to blow into the bugle. He blows louder and more beautifully and mournfully than anybody ever blew into a bugle. Eighteen Neighbors gather in front of the house and cheer when he finishes the solo: "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes"]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Delighted, for amusement] I want you to meet your public. [They go out on the porch]

The house. The crowd is looking up at Johnny's Father, MacGregor and Johnny.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Good neighbors, and friends, I want you to meet Jasper MacGregor, the greatest Shakespearean actor of our day. [Pause] I believe.

MAC GREGOR: [The actor] I remember my first appearance in London in 1851 as if it was yesterday. I was a boy of fourteen from the slums of Glasgow. My first part was a courier in a play, the title of which I have unfortunately forgotten. I had no lines to speak, but moved about a good deal, running from officer to officer, and from lover to his beloved, and back again, over and over again.

RUFE APLEY, THE CARPENTER: [Regretfully interrupting the great speech] How about another song, Mr. MacGregor?

MAC GREGOR: Have you got an egg at your house? RUFE APLEY: I sure have. I've got a dozen eggs at my house.

MAC GREGOR: Would it be convenient for you to go and get one of them dozen eggs? When you return I'll play a song that will make your heart leap with joy and grief.

RUFE APLEY: I'm on my way already. [He goes] MAC GREGOR: [To the crowd] My friends, I should be delighted to play another song for you on this golden-throated bugle, but time and distance from home find me weary. If you will be so good as to go, each of you to his home, and return in a moment with some morsel of food, I shall be proud to gather my spirit together and play a song I know will change the course of each of your lives, and change it, mind you, for the better. [The people go. The last to go is Esther Kosak, who hears the speech out, then runs. MacGregor, Johnny's father, and Johnny sit on the steps and remain in silence, and one by one the people return, bringing food to Mac-Gregor: an egg, a sausage, a dozen green onions, two kinds of cheese, butter, two kinds of bread, boiled potatoes, fresh tomatoes, a melon, tea, and many other good things to eat] Thank you, my friends, thank you. [He stands solemnly, waiting for absolute silence, straightens himself, looks about him furiously, lifts the bugle to his lips and is irritated by the swift and noisy return of Esther Kosak, bringing an eggplant. When there is silence, he plays "My Heart's in the Highlands, My Heart is not Here." The People weep, kneel, sing the chorus, and go away. MacGregor turns to the father and son. Grandly] Sir, if it is all the same to you I should like to dwell in your house for a long time to come.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Delighted and amazed] Sir, my house is your house. [They go into the house]

The living room. Eighteen days later, MacGregor is lying on the floor, face up, asleep. Johnny is walking about quietly in the room, looking at everybody. His Father is at the table, writing poetry. His Grandmother is sitting in the rocking chair, rocking. There is a knock on the door. Everybody but MacGregor jumps up and runs to it.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [At the door] Yes? YOUNG MAN: I am looking for Jasper MacGregor, the actor.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: What do you want? JOHNNY: Well, ask him in anyway, Pa.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Yes, of course. Excuse me. Won't you please come in? [The Young Man enters] YOUNG MAN: My name is Philip Carmichael. I am from the Old People's Home. I have been sent to bring Mr. MacGregor home.

MAC GREGOR: [Wakening and sitting up] Home? Did someone mention home? [Roaring] I'm five thousand miles from home, always have been, and always will be. Who is this young man?

YOUNG MAN: Mr. MacGregor, I'm Philip Carmichael, from the Old People's Home. They've sent me to bring you back. We are putting on our annual show in two weeks and need you for the leading role.

MAC GREGOR: [Getting up with the help of Johnny's Father and Johnny] What kind of a part is it? I can't be playing young adventurers any longer.

YOUNG MAN: The part is King Lear, Mr. Mac-Gregor. It is perfect for you.

MAC GREGOR: [The actor, with a job again] Goodby, my beloved friends. [He returns from the porch] In all the hours of my life, in all the places I have visited, never and nowhere have I had the honor and pleasure to commune with souls loftier, purer, or more delightful than yours. Good-by. [The Old Man and the Young Man leave the house. There is a moment of silence, full of regret and loneliness]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Hungry, loudly] Johnny, go on down to Mr. Kosak's store and get a little something to eat. I know you can do it, Johnny. Get ANYTHING.

JOHNNY: [Hungry, loudly, and angry] Mr. Kosak wants eighty-five cents. He won't give us anything more without money.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Go on down there, Johnny You know you can get that fine Slovak gentleman to give us a little something to eat.

JOHNNY: [With despair] Aw, Pa.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Amazed, roaring] What? You, my son, in a mood like that. Come on. I fought the world this way before you were born. After you were born we fought it together, and we're going to go on fighting it. The people love poetry but don't know it, that's all. Nothing is going to stop us, Johnny. Go on down there now and get us something to eat.

JOHNNY: All right, Pa. I'll do my best. [He runs to the door]

The house. It now has a large sign: "For Rent." It is a moment before daybreak of a day early in November, 1914. There is a suggestion of Winter coming. High in the sky a flock of geese flying south make their call. Johnny is sitting on the steps of the front porch with his chin in his hand. He hears the geese, listening carefully, leaps to his feet and looks into the sky for them. The sound decreases, then ends. Johnny goes back to the steps of the porch and sits down. As the sun rises, a big solemn smile comes over his face. He looks out of the corner of his eye at the morning's light as if it were a quiet friend with whom he was on terms of perfect understanding. As the light increases, this play between Johnny and the sun grows, like a theme of music. bringing him to his feet, turning his face to the light. He lifts his arms, and very solemnly begins turning somersaults. He then runs around the house licketysplit and returns on the other side, almost dancing.

A freight train goes by not far enough away not to make the earth tremble. The light of morning increases.

A newspaper route carrier arrives on foot, whistling. He is the typical small-town morning route carrier: about thirteen years old. He is in that somber and dignified state which comes over men who have done their work. His paper bags are empty. Night is over. His daily wage has been earned. The papers have been left at the doors of the readers. Another day has come to the world. He has walked two hours through dark streets to morning. The song he is whistling is soft and full of understanding. It is a song of his own composition, a morning song.

JOHNNY: [Running down the steps] Hello.

THE BOY: [Stopping] Hello. JOHNNY: What was that song?

THE BOY: What song?

JOHNNY: That you were whistling?

THE BOY: Was I whistling?

JOHNNY: Sure. Didn't you know?

THE BOY: I guess I'm always whistling.

JOHNNY: What was it? THE BOY: I don't know.

JOHNNY: I wish I could whistle.
THE BOY: Anybody can whistle.
JOHNNY: I can't. How do you do it?

THE BOY: There's no how to it. You just whistle.

JOHNNY: How?

THE BOY: Like this. [He whistles a moment, obviously improvising a tour de force of technique]

JOHNNY: [With admiration] I wish I could do that.

THE BOY: [Pleased and eager to make an even better impression] That was nothing. Listen to this.

[He gives the melody a sort of counterpoint, two tones, and a bit of syncopation]

JOHNNY: Can't you teach me to do that?

THE BOY: You can't teach whistling. You just do it. This is another way. [He whistles a little melody, the loud newsboy's style, but keeps it soft]

JOHNNY: [Trying to whistle] Like that?

THE BOY: That's the way to start. Keep it up and after a while your mouth'll take the right shape and you'll be whistling before you know it.

JOHNNY: Honest? THE BOY: Sure.

JOHNNY: Is your mother dead? THE BOY: How did you know? JOHNNY: My mother's dead too.

THE BOY: Yeah?

JOHNNY: [With a sigh] Yeah. She died.

THE BOY: I don't remember my mother. Do you remember your mother?

JOHNNY: I don't exactly remember her. Sometimes I dream about her, though.

THE BOY: I used to, too.

JOHNNY: Don't you any more?

THE BOY: [Disillusioned] Naaaah. What good does that do you?

JOHNNY: My mother sure is beautiful.

THE BOY: Yeah, I know. I remember. You got a father?

JOHNNY: [Proudly] Oh, sure. He's in the house now, sleeping.

THE BOY: My father's dead, too.

JOHNNY: Your father, too?

THE BOY: [Matter-of-fact] Yeah. [They begin bouncing an old tennis ball back and forth to each other]

JOHNNY: Haven't you got anybody?

THE BOY: I got an aunt, but she ain't really my aunt. I was brought up in an orphanage. I'm adopted.

JOHNNY: What's an orphanage?

THE BOY: That's a kind of a place where kids that ain't got any mothers and fathers live until somebody adopts them.

JOHNNY: What do you mean, adopts?

THE BOY: Somebody who wants a boy or girl comes to the orphanage and looks everybody over and goes away with whoever they like. If they pick you, you go and stay with them.

JOHNNY: Do you like that?

THE BOY: It's all right. [The Boy puts away the ball]

JOHNNY: What's your name? THE BOY: Henry. What's yours?

JOHNNY: Johnny.

THE BOY: Do you want a paper? There's a War in Europe.

JOHNNY: I haven't got any money. We aren't rich. We don't work. My father writes poetry.

THE BOY: [Giving Johnny the extra] Oh, that's all right. Don't you ever have any money?

JOHNNY: Sometimes. I found a quarter once. It was lying on the sidewalk, right in front of me. Once my father got a check for ten dollars from New York, too. We bought a chicken and a lot of stamps and paper and envelopes. The chicken wouldn't lay eggs, though, so my grandmother killed it and cooked it for us. Did you ever eat chicken?

THE BOY: Sure. I guess I've eaten chicken six or seven times.

JOHNNY: What are you going to do when you grow up?

THE BOY: Shucks. I don't know. I don't know what I'll do.

JOHNNY: [Proudly] I'm going to be a poet, like my father. He said so.

THE BOY: I guess I'll carry a paper route for a while. [He moves to go] Well. So long.

JOHNNY: Won't you come here again?

THE BOY: I go by here every morning about this time. I ain't never seen you up before, though.

JOHNNY: [Smiling] I had a dream and then I woke up and didn't want to sleep any more. I wanted to get up and come out here. I saw my mother.

THE BOY: Maybe I'll see you again some morning when you can't sleep.

JOHNNY: I hope so. So long.

THE BOY: So long. Just keep trying and you'll be whistling before you know it.

JOHNNY: Thanks. [The Boy goes, whistling. Johnny tosses the folded paper up on the porch, and sits down again on the steps. His Grandmother comes out on the porch with a broom and begins to sweep]

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: [In Armenian, which is the only language she speaks, with the exception of Turkish, Kurdish, and a little Arabic, which nobody around seems to know] How are you, my heart?

JOHNNY: [Who understands Armenian, but hardly ever speaks it; in English] Fine.

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: How's your Papa?

JOHNNY: I don't know. [Calling loudly to his Father] Oh, Pa. How are you? [Pause. Louder] Pa. [Pause. Silence] I guess he's sleeping.

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: Is there any money? JOHNNY: Money? [Shaking his head] No.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [From inside the house] Johnny?

JOHNNY: [Jumping to his feet] Pa? JOHNNY'S FATHER: Did you call? JOHNNY: Yeah. How are you?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Fine, Johnny. How are you?

JOHNNY: Fine, Pa.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Is that all you woke me up for?

JOHNNY: [To his Grandmother] He's fine. [Louder to his Father] The old lady wanted to know.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [In Armenian, to the old lady] Good night, Ma. [To Johnny, in English] What do you mean, old? She's not so old.

JOHNNY: I don't mean old. You know what I mean.

[Johnny's Father comes out on the porch, buttoning his shirt, nods to the old lady, looks out of the corner of his eye at the sun, exactly the same way Johnny did, smiling the same way, stretches all over, faces the sun, leaps down the steps and turns one somersault, not so good. The somersault leaves him flat on his back

JOHNNY: You ought to get a little more exercise, Pa. You're always sitting down.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [On his back] Johnny, your father is a great poet. I may not be able to turn a somersault as well as you, but if you want to know what kind of an athlete I am, just read the poetry I wrote yesterday.

JOHNNY: Is it really good, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Good? [He leaps to his feet, like an acrobat] It's great. I'm going to send it to The Atlantic Monthly, too.

JOHNNY: Oh, I forgot, Pa. There's a paper on the porch.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Going up to the porch] You mean a morning paper, Johnny?

JOHNNY: Yeah.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Well, that's a pleasant surprise. Where in the world did you get it?

JOHNNY: Henry gave it to me.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Henry? Who's Henry?

JOHNNY: He's a boy who hasn't got a mother or a father, either. He sure can whistle, too.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Picking up the paper, opening it] That was certainly nice of him. [He loses himself in the headlines]

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: [To both of them, to herself, and to the world] Where's that man?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Deep in the news] Hmmm? JOHNNY: Who?

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: You know. That old man who blew the horn. [She pantomimes the blowing of a horn]

JOHNNY: Oh. Mr. MacGregor? They took him back to the Old People's Home.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Reading the paper] Austria. Germany. France. England. Russia. Zeppelins. Submarines. Tanks. Machine guns. Bombs. [Shaking his head] They've gone crazy again.

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: [To Johnny, reproachfully] Why don't you speak Armenian, boy?

JOHNNY: I can't talk Armenian.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [To Johnny] What's the matter?

JOHNNY: She wants to know about Mr. Mac-Gregor.

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: [To Johnny's Father] Where is he?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [In Armenian] He's back in the Old People's Home.

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: [Shaking her head sadly] Ahkh, ahkh, the poor old prisoner.

JOHNNY: Is it like a prison, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I don't know for sure, Johnny.

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: [Furiously, the way her son and grandson speak when they are irritated]

Why doesn't he come back and stay here where he belongs? [She goes into the house]

JOHNNY: That's right, Pa. Why doesn't Mr. Mac-Gregor come back and stay here? Does he have to stay in that place?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: If you're an old, old man, Johnny, and haven't got any people, and no money, I guess you do.

JOHNNY: I sure get lonesome for him sometimes. Don't you, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: To tell you the truth, Johnny, I do.

JOHNNY: I'm always remembering him, especially the music. And the way he drinks water.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: He's a great man.

JOHNNY: Is his heart really in the highlands like he said, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Not exactly.

JOHNNY: Is he really five thousand miles from home, too?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: At least that many.

JOHNNY: Do you think he'll ever get home again some day?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: He's an old man, Johnny. He will.

JOHNNY: You mean he'll take a train and a boat and get back where the highlands are?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Not that, Johnny. It's a little different from that. He'll die.

JOHNNY: Is that the only way a man gets home? JOHNNY'S FATHER: That's the only way.

[All this time, of course, Johnny's Father has been turning the pages of the morning paper, and Johnny has been going through various kinds of acrobatics, walking on the porch railing, leaping down, turning somersaults, standing on his head, and so forth. Some of his questions have been asked while he has been standing on his head. A sharp whistle is heard in the distance]

JOHNNY: [Eagerly] It's Mr. Wiley, the mailman, Pa. [Johnny's Father jumps to his feet, dropping the paper]

JOHNNY: Do you think maybe we'll get a letter from New York with a check in it maybe?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I don't know, Johnny.

[Mr. Wiley, riding a bicycle, arrives. He is almost knocked off the bicycle by Johnny and Johnny's Father]

MR. WILEY: [Getting off the bicycle as if it were a horse] Good morning, Mr. Alexander.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Good morning, Mr. Wiley.

JOHNNY: Any mail for us, Mr. Wiley?

MR. WILEY: [Bringing a packet of letters from his bag, loosening the strap, and looking them over] Well, now, let me see, Johnny. I think I've got something here for your father.

JOHNNY: Is it from New York?

MR. WILEY: [Holding a flat envelope] Yes, it is,

Johnny. Well, Mr. Alexander, it looks like Winter's coming again. The geese were flying this morning.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Excited, tense, yet eager to be casual] Yes, I know. [To himself] I know. I know.

JOHNNY: If I ever get a letter from New York I'm going to save it up.

MR. WILEY: [He wants to talk] How are things, Mr. Alexander?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I've been lucky in my work, thank you, Mr. Wiley.

JOHNNY: My father was in New York once. Weren't you, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Yes, I was, Johnny. How is your family, Mr. Wiley?

MR. WILEY: All fine, except the littlest one, Joe. He's always crying. That's one thing I can't stand either, a baby crying all the time. I don't know what it does to me, but it makes me lose all faith in everything. When Joe cries I say to myself, Aw, what's the use?

JOHNNY: I guess I'll reach New York some day before I die.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: It's nothing, Mr. Wiley. He'll stop crying after a while.

MR. WILEY: Well, I hope so, and the sooner the better. [He goes off with the envelope] Good-by, Mr. Alexander. Good-by, Johnny.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Mr. Wiley.

[Mr. Wiley hands over the envelope. They say good-by, and Mr. Wiley rides off. Johnny's Father holds the envelope before him, obviously eager to open it, yet fearful to do so]

JOHNNY: [Impatient] All right, Pa. Go ahead; open it. What are you waiting for?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Angry; roaring] Johnny, I'm scared. I can't understand how I, your father. can be so scared.

JOHNNY: You don't sound scared, Pa. Who's it from?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: It's from The Atlantic Monthly all right. You remember them poems J wrote after Mr. MacGregor was here?

JOHNNY: Maybe they've bought the poems.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Bought them, my eye. They don't buy poetry, Johnny. They scare you to death. [Reading his name and address with great solemnity, awful fearfulness and terrible rage] Ben Alexander, 2226 San Benito Avenue, Fresno, California.

JOHNNY: It's for you all right, Pa. Why don't you open it?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Roaring] I'm scared, I tell you. I'm scared and ashamed. Those poems were great. How can it be that I'm scared?

JOHNNY: [Also defiant] Don't be scared, Pa.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Angry] Why do they clamor for all things but the best? Why do they destroy themselves running after things of death, and thrust aside all things of life? I can't understand it. There's no hope for anybody.

JOHNNY: Sure there is, Pa. [Furiously] Who the hell is The Atlantic Monthly?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Angry] Johnny, go away. Go away. Please go away.

JOHNNY: [Angry, too] All right, Pa. [Johnny goes around the house, reappears, looks at his father a moment, and then knows he must stay out of the way]

[It is obvious that Johnny's Father knows The Atlantic Monthly has sent back the poems. It is equally obvious that he can't believe the poems have come back. It is obvious too that the poems are great, because the man is. He paces about like a tiger. He seems to be speaking to the world, even though his lips are set. At last he tears the envelope open, in a fury. The envelope falls. He unfolds the manuscript of poems. A slip of white, heavy paper falls to the floor of the porch. He stands, very tall, and very proud, and reads the poems to himself, turning the pages swiftly]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Furiously] Ah, you crazy, miserable fools. [He sits on the steps of the porch and buries his face in his hands. The manuscript of poems is on the steps. After several minutes he kicks the poems off the steps of the porch onto the ground and takes up the morning paper again, looking at the headlines. Quietly, with deep fury, his voice mounting in intensity] Go ahead, kill everybody. Declare War on one another. Take the people by the thousands and mangle them. Their poor hearts and their poor spirits and their poor bodies. Give them ugliness. Pollute their dreams. Horrify them. Distort them with hatred for one another. Befoul the legend of the living, you maniacs whose greatness is measured by the number you destroy. [Johnny appears at the side of the house, unseen. He stands in a trance, listening to his father. The sky begins to darken You frauds of the world. You wretched and ungodly. [He stands and points a finger, as if across the world] Go ahead. Fire your feeble guns. You won't kill anything. [Quietly, smiling] There will always be poets in the world.

[Lightning flashes silently]

The house. The sky is dark, as at the beginning of a storm. An occasional deep and faraway roar of thunder is heard, and a flash of lightning is seen. Johnny's Father is on the steps of the porch, smiling: a foolish, tragic, desolate, lonely smile. Everything is the same; the manuscript of poems is on the ground; the envelope is on the porch. The newspaper too. It is several hours later.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Shaking his head foolishly, unable to accept the truth] Johnny. [Pause. A little louder] Johnny. [Pause, softer this time] Johnny. [Roaring] Johnny. [The boy comes around the house shyly and stands before his father. His father looks up, fire in his eye, defiant, bitter, stubborn, powerful]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Tenderly, but with tremendous power] Have you had your breakfast?

JOHNNY: [Shyly] I'm not hungry, Pa.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: You go inside now and eat.

JOHNNY: I'm not hungry.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: You do what I tell you.

JOHNNY: I won't eat unless you do.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: You do what I tell you.

JOHNNY: I won't eat unless you do. JOHNNY'S FATHER: I'm not hungry.

JOHNNY: I'll go down to Mr. Kosak's and see if I can get something.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Humiliated. Taking the boy's arm] No, Johnny. [He pauses, obviously trying to find words with which to explain about themselves and the grocer] Johnny? I thought we'd be getting some money. I didn't think it would be this way. Now, go on inside and eat.

JOHNNY: [Going up the stairs] You got to eat, too. [He goes into the house]

[There is a silent flash of lightning. A Man in a business suit, and a young Husband and Wife with a Baby in the mother's arms, come up]

THE REAL ESTATE MAN: This is the house. The rent's six dollars a month. It's not exactly fancy, but it'll keep out the rain and cold.

[Johnny's Father has been staring at the people, his vision frozen]

THE REAL ESTATE MAN: [Coming up to Johnny's Father, extending his hand, while the others stand back in a group] Remember me? I put up the "For Rent" sign.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Rising] I remember. How do you do.

THE REAL ESTATE MAN: [Embarrassed] Well. Mr. Corey, the owner of the house, is out of town, and these people are looking for a house. Right away.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Of course. I can leave any time. Have they furniture?

THE REAL ESTATE MAN: [Turning to the poor family] Have you furniture?

THE HUSBAND: No.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [To the family] You can have my furniture. There isn't much of it, but it'll do. There's a pretty good stove.

THE WIFE: [With the dignity of the poor] We wouldn't want to take your furniture.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: That's all right. I haven't paid rent for three months. I'll leave the furniture for the rent. [The Real Estate Man tries to speak]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: It's all right. I'm sorry I haven't the $18. The furniture's worth about that much. You can let these people have it till Mr. Corey gets back. [To the family] Do you want to go through the house?

THE HUSBAND: It looks all right.

THE REAL ESTATE MAN: [Going] Then that's settled. [To the people] The rent's six dollars a month. We pay the water.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [To the people] You can move in any time.

THE HUSBAND: Thank you very much. We'll be back this afternoon or tomorrow. [They are going as Johnny comes out with a plate containing two slices of bread and a small bunch of grapes]

JOHNNY: Who were those people?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Just some people walking by.

JOHNNY: What were you talking about? JOHNNY'S FATHER: Just talking, Johnny.

JOHNNY: [Shouting; very angry] Don't feel bad, Pa.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Turning and looking at the boy with love, amazement, admiration, and delight, laughing suddenly] I don't feel bad, Johnny. Let the world be the world, and God love everyone.

JOHNNY: [Bantering] All right then. Let's eat. [He puts the plate on the top step and they sit down together and begin to eat. They eat in silence, looking at one another, the boy looking at his father out of the corner of his eye as he had looked at the sun; the father looking at the boy the same way. The boy begins to smile. The father begins to smile too]

JOHNNY: Do you like grapes, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Of course I like grapes.

JOHNNY: Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Yes?

JOHNNY: Is it really like a prison?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Sometimes I'm sure it is.

Sometimes I know it never can be,

JOHNNY: What, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I guess it's fifty-fifty, Johnny. You know. It's both.

JOHNNY: I mean, do you think he gets homesick sometimes?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I'm sure he does.

JOHNNY: I wish he'd come back.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I'd like to see him again.

JOHNNY: I remember him all the time.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I do too. I'll always remember him.

JOHNNY: So will I. Did he have to go back, Pa? JOHNNY'S FATHER: I guess he did.

JOHNNY: He seemed like a nice young man.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: You mean the young man who came and got him?

JOHNNY: Yeah, you know. That young man who talked so sharp, like he was speaking in front of an audience.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: He was all right. [There is one more grape on the plate]

JOHNNY: Go ahead, Pa. Take it.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Blithely] No, that's yours, Johnny. I counted.

JOHNNY: All right, Pa. [He takes the last grape and eats it] Is it stealing, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Comically] Well, some say it is and some say it isn't. [Dramatically] I say it isn't. [Shouting] You took them off the vines, didn't you? JOHNNY: I took them off the vines all right, Pa.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Comically] Then it couldn't very well be stealing.

JOHNNY: When would it be stealing?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Tossing it off like nothing] The way I see it, Johnny, stealing is where there's unnecessary damage or cruelty to an innocent one, so that there may be undeserved profit or power to one who is not innocent.

JOHNNY: Oh. [Pause] Well, if it isn't stealing, Pa, I guess I'll go get some more. [He gets up] They'll all be gone pretty soon. [Goes off]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [When the boy is gone, laughing] My son John. My God, how fortunate I have been. How grateful I am. [He picks up the manuscript of poems, puts it in his coat pocket, and walks down the street]

The inside of Mr. Kosak's Grocery Store. Again Mr. Kosak is sleeping on his folded arms. The store looks more poverty-stricken than before. The family apparently has been eating the stock. Johnny's father comes into the store quietly, almost shyly. Mr. Kosak lifts his head, blinks his eyes, stands.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Almost guiltily] I'm Johnny's father.

[The two men stand staring at one another a moment, each of them delighted, embarrassed, impressed, pleased, and angry about the same things in the world: greed, deceit, unkindliness, disproportion. They each begin to smile, then shake hands warmly]

MR. KOSAK: I recognize you. Johnny has told me about you. It is an honor.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: You are a kind man.

MR. KOSAK: I do not know.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Slowly] I have come to say good-by. To apologize. To thank you.

MR. KOSAK: [Swiftly] You're not going away?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I'm sorry, yes. MR. KOSAK: We shall all miss Johnny.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I have no money. I am in debt to you.

MR. KOSAK: It is nothing.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I may not see you again. [He brings the manuscript of poems from his pocket. Powerfully] I am a poet. These are some of my poems. [Swiftly] I am not offering them to you in place of the money I owe you. Money is another thing. [Pleading] Will you keep them for your kindness?

MR. KOSAK: [Sincerely] I cannot take your poems. [Pause]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I hope you have been prospering.

MR. KOSAK: The people have no money. I do not know how I am going to put in new stock.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I'm sorry.

MR. KOSAK: In the Winter it is worse. The packing-houses are closed. There are no jobs. I would give them something if I could, but this Winter I have no money for new stock. I may have to close the store. There is hardly enough for my family.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Touched and angry] These poems. Let me tell you they are the finest I have ever written. I want to leave them with you.

[Mr. Kosak's daughter, Esther, a beautiful girl of seven, comes into the store, from the back]
MR. KOSAK: This is my daughter Esther. Esther, this is Johnny's father.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Johnny's told me about you. ESTHER: [Really pleased, but shy] How do you do. MR. KOSAK: They're going away.

ESTHER: [Shocked] Oh.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Johnny will miss you.

[The girl's lips tremble, tears come to her eyes. She turns and runs out of the store]

MR. KOSAK: Everything is like that. JOHNNY'S FATHER: They are children.

MR. KOSAK: Yes, but it's that way from the beginning and it never changes. Only women never learn to believe it.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Won't you give her these poems?

MR. KOSAK: Please. It's nothing. She will cry for a while, but it is nothing.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Here. [Giving Mr. Kosak the poems] You will be doing me a kindness by keeping them. [Loudly, to God and the world] Don't you see, poetry must be read to be poetry. It may be that one reader is all that I deserve. If this is so, I want that reader to be you.

MR. KOSAK: Thank you. I am unworthy. JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Smiling] Good-by.

MR. KOSAK: Good-by.

[Johnny's Father goes out of the store. The grocer takes his glasses out of his pocket, puts them on, unfolds the manuscript, and standing in the middle of the store, begins to read, softly, to himself, moving his lips. The expression of his face begins to change. Rain begins to fall. His daughter Esther comes back into the store

MR. KOSAK: [Reading from one of the poems, in a quiet voice] Deep in the bowels of the earth, and far dispersed into the green waters of the sea, and held tight within the hardness of rock, I thee remember, love, remember me. [The girl begins to sob aloud, and the father turns and goes to her]

The living room of the house. Some time later. Johnny's Father is at his table, looking over a stack of manuscripts. It is still raining. Every once in a while he gets up and goes to the window.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: What the hell's happened to him? [He goes back to his manuscripts and looks over some poems, grows irritated with them, throws them down, and goes to the window again. Then begins to walk back and forth, waiting. At last Johnny tears up the front porch stairs, bursts into the house, closes the door quickly, and bolts it. He is breathless and scared. You know he is one who has been pursued. He has four medium-sized bunches of purple-red Emperors; a half dozen black figs, and two pomegranates]

JOHNNY: [Excited and breathless] Where shall I hide them, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: What's the matter, Johnny? JOHNNY: You said it wasn't stealing, Pa.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [With furious irritation] Well, it isn't.

JOHNNY: What about the farmer's dog, then?
JOHNNY'S FATHER: What are you talking about?
What farmer's dog?

JOHNNY: The farmer's dog that chased me all the way here.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Dog? Do you mean to tell me a dog chased you? What kind of a dog?

JOHNNY: I didn't get a chance to take a good look, but I guess it's a great big one.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Very angry at this awful humiliation] Did the God damn thing try to bite you or anything, Johnny?

JOHNNY: I don't think so, Pa, but I thought it was going to any minute.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Did it growl at you?

JOHNNY: It wasn't exactly a growl.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: What happened?

JOHNNY: I just ran all the way, with the dog right behind me.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Where is it now?

JOHNNY: It's outside, I think, Pa. Are you sure it isn't stealing?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Very angry, eating three or four grapes] Of course it isn't stealing. I'll take care of the dog. No man or beast can scare your father, Johnny. Always remember that. [He goes cautiously to the window and peeks out]

JOHNNY: Is it out there, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: There's a little dog out there, Johnny. It's asleep, I think.

JOHNNY: [Jumping bitterly] I knew it. It's the farmer's dog, waiting for me.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: It's not a very big dog, Johnny. JOHNNY: Yeah, but if it's stealing—if it's the farmer's dog—what about that?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Why, that little bitty dog doesn't belong to anybody, Johnny. That little dog is looking for a friend, I bet.

JOHNNY: It chased me all the way. Are you sure, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Sure I'm sure, Johnny. I'm no poet for nothing. I understand things. [The dog begins to growl and bark. Johnny's Father jumps back from the window, frightened. Johnny jumps tense and speechless]

JOHNNY: [Whispering] What is it, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Somebody's coming, I think.

JOHNNY: You see, Pa? It is stealing. It's the farmer. [He runs to the table and gathers the fruit into his arms. His Grandmother comes running into the room]

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: [In Armenian] What's all the hullabaloo, in the rain?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Shhhh. [Johnny takes the fruit out of the living room; returns, scared to death. The dog is still growling and barking. Johnny's Father is even more scared than Johnny]

JOHNNY: [Sore, and now defiant] God damn it, Pa. Now look at the mess we're in.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I wish I had a cigarette.

JOHNNY: [Now worrying about his father; to his grandmother, in Armenian] Are there cigarettes? [Johnny's Grandmother runs into the next room. The dog stops growling]

JOHNNY: You see, Pa? It's the farmer. Where shall I hide? Don't open the door.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Open the door? Help me with this table. [They push the table up against the door, and tiptoe back to the center of the room. Johnny's Grandmother runs back with one cigarette and one match which she hands to Johnny's Father, who lights the cigarette, inhales deeply, and straightens up]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Dramatically] I am the one who took the fruit, understand, Johnny?

JOHNNY: Don't open the door, Pa. [Johnny's Father picks up a small stool, takes it quietly to the table up against the door, places it on the table, to make it heavier. Johnny picks up a chair and puts it on the table. The Old Lady puts a vase on the table. Johnny's Father adds three books to the barricade. In fact, as the knocks continue, the family little by little puts all the household goods up against the door]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Don't be afraid, Johnny. JOHNNY: He can't get in, can he, Pa? JOHNNY'S FATHER: I don't think so.

[The Grandmother, the Father and the Son stand together in the bare room, defying the world. There is a long pause, full of mingling of awful fear and furious defiance. After half a minute the silence is broken. It is a solo on the bugle: "My Heart's in the Highlands." The sun comes out]

JOHNNY: [Shouting] It's Mr. MacGregor.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Running to the window, lifting it, and shouting out to MacGregor] Welcome, Mr. MacGregor. Johnny, rearrange the furniture. [Johnny's Father returns to the barricade and helps Johnny and his Grandmother rearrange the furniture. At last everything is out of the way. Johnny's Father swings open the door. Jasper MacGregor, still playing the solo, preceded by the dog, which is a very small street dog, comes in. The dog runs around playfully, all excited. MacGregor's eyes are full of grief and joy. Johnny begins making trips to the kitchen, returning with the fruit, on a plate, and a pitcher of water. MacGregor finishes the solo. There is a moment when everybody stands stock-still, including the dog. Johnny offers MacGregor the pitcher of water]

MAC GREGOR: [Weary] Not this time, Johnny. JOHNNY'S FATHER: Welcome, my friend.

MAC GREGOR: I've run away. They're after me now, but I won't go back. They stole my bugle. They tried to keep me in bed. They said I was sick. I'm not sick; I'm old. I know my days on earth are numbered. I want them to be with you. Don't let them take me back.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I won't. [He draws out a chair for the old man] Please sit down. [They all sit down. MacGregor looks around at everybody]

MAC GREGOR: It's good to see you again.

JOHNNY: Is your heart still in the highlands?

MAC GREGOR: [Nodding] In the highlands, son.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Angry] Johnny.

JOHNNY: [Sore, too] What? JOHNNY'S FATHER: Shut up.

JOHNNY: Why?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Why? What do you get so dumb for every once in a while? Can't you see Mr. MacGregor is weary?

JOHNNY: [To MacGregor] Are you?

MAC GREGOR: [Nods] But where's your mother, son?

JOHNNY: She's dead.

MAC GREGOR: [Almost to himself] Not dead, Johnny. [He shakes his head] In the highlands.

JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: [To his father] What's he saying?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Shaking his head] Nothing. [To MAC GREGOR] Won't you eat?

MAC GREGOR: [Looking at the plate] One grape. No more. [He plucks a grape off a bunch, puts it in his mouth. Suddenly turns, startled] Are they coming?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Don't be afraid, my friend. Lie down and rest. [Johnny's Father takes the Old Man to the couch. The Old Man stretches out, face up. Johnny's Father returns to the table. Nobody is eating. The Old Man jumps up suddenly. It's nothing again. He gets up and returns to the table]

MAC GREGOR: You won't let them take me back, will you?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: No. [He breaks open a pomegranate and hands MacGregor half] Try to eat something.

MAC GREGOR: Thank you, my friend. [He eats some of the pomegranate. There is a knock on the door, MacGregor leaps to his feet, furiously]

MAC GREGOR: [Roaring] You'll not take me back. I warn you. I'll fall down and die. I belong here, with these people.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Scared] Shall we open the door?

JOHNNY: [Also scared] Shall we?

MAC GREGOR: [Powerfully] Of course we'll open the door. [He goes to the door, opens it. It is Rufe

Apley, the carpenter, who is a little shaken up by MacGregor's fury]

RUFE APLEY: Hello, Mr. MacGregor.

JOHNNY: Who is it?

RUFE APLEY: It's Rufe Apley.
MAC GREGOR: How do you do, Rufe.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [At the door] Come in, Rufe. [Rufe comes in. He has a loaf of bread, a sausage and two eggs in his hands]

RUFE: I was sitting home doing nothing when I heard that song again. I was sure it was Mr. Mac-Gregor.

MAC GREGOR: I'm delighted you remembered. RUFE: Nobody could ever forget that song, Mr. MacGregor. I brought these few things.

MAC GREGOR: [Taking them and putting them on the table] Thank you, my friend, thank you.

[There is another knock at the door. It is Sam Wallace; he is a lineman, in full regalia: overalls, tools hanging all over him, tape, straps around his calves, spikes, everything. He has cheese and tomatoes and radishes with him]

WALLACE: I knew it was Mr. MacGregor. I said to myself, I'll go over with a few little things to eat.

MAC GREGOR: This is indeed a pleasant surprise.

RUFE: [Obviously trying hard to say something]

Ah, Mr. MacGregor?

MAC GREGOR: Yes, my friend? Speak up. I'm a plain man, no different in any way from yourself. RUFE: My wife's sister and her family are outside. I know they'd like to hear you play again. There are some other people.

MAC GREGOR: [Flattered] Of course I'll play. I'm over eighty and not long for this world. Before I go I'd like to become a part of you who shall live after I am dead. Are there children out there too? RUFE: Seven. My wife's sister's kids.

[Three or four more neighbors come in, bringing food. MacGregor takes up his bugle. Everybody follows him out of the room to the porch, except Johnny's Father. MacGregor begins to play the solo again. This time he's too old and weak to really play, but he finishes the solo as well as he is able to. Johnny's Father paces about the room, smiling, frowning, loving the place. The door to the kitchen opens quietly and Esther Kosak stands in the doorway. Johnny's Father turns and sees her. She is no longer crying. She has something clutched in her fist]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Quietly] Hello, Esther.

esther: Where's Johnny?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: I'll go get him. [He goes out on the porch. The Girl stands alone in terrible sadness and loneliness. After a moment Johnny comes rushing in, all excited, but calms down quickly when he begins to feel the mood of the girl]

JOHNNY: Helio, Esther. ESTHER: Helio, Johnny. JOHNNY: What's the matter? ESTHER: My father read me the poems.

JOHNNY: What?

ESTHER: [Holding out her hand] Here. This is all I've got. [Johnny takes a handful of coins] I've been saving up for Christmas. [She begins to cry, turns, and runs out of the house]

JOHNNY: [Deeply touched and furious, sensing something profound and beautiful and terrible] Holy Moses. [His face takes on boyhood's tragic expression of grief, and he begins to cry. He throws the coins against the wall and falls down, sobbing] Who the hell wants that stuff? [Johnny's Father comes back]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Johnny. [Going closer] Johnny?

JOHNNY: [Sobbing and angry] She brought me money.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: It's no use crying, Johnny.

JOHNNY: [Jumping up] Who's crying? [He cries harder than ever]

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Go wash your face. It's nothing.

JOHNNY: [Going] Something's wrong somewhere. [MacGregor finishes the solo, the people are silent with awe and the knowledge that something is wrong. MacGregor's Voice is heard for a moment in a speech]

MAC GREGOR: [Wearily] The years, my friends. I have walked to the end of them. I'm sorry I can no longer play for you. Thank you. Thank you.

[Johnny's Father walks back and forth in the room. He sits down at the table and looks at the food. MacGregor and Johnny's Grandmother return and sit at the table. The dog lies down in a corner]

MAC GREGOR: [He lifts the water pitcher, drinks a little] They wouldn't let me play. [He drinks a little more] They stole my bugle. [He drinks a little more] They said I was sick. [He drinks a little more] I'm strong as a bull. If they come to take me back, I shall pretend that I am dying. I shall play the death scene from "King Lear." I shall play all the death scenes.

[Johnny returns solemnly. They are all at the table. Nobody can eat but the Old Lady. There is a long silence. The Old Lady stops eating]
JOHNNY'S GRANDMOTHER: What's the matter? Why this terrible gloom? [MacGregor rises]

MAC GREGOR: [Reciting, remembering lines from Shakespeare, and inventing a few of his own] Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! Rage! blow! You cataracts and hurricanes, spout till you have drenched our steeples, drowned the cocks! You sulphurous and thought-executing fires, singe my white head! Humble thy belly-full, spit fire, spout rain! I never gave you kingdom, call'd you children. Here I stand, your slave, a poor infirm, weak and despised old man. To be or not to be . . . [Tragically] To be— To be— What? A fool? A man mocked by destiny? Turned away from home and fire and love? I am a man more sinned against than sinning. Arms! Arms! Sword! Fire! Corruption in the place! The little dogs and all, Tray, Blanche, Sweetheart. See? They bark at me. O, that way madness lies—no more of that—let me shun that. My wits begin to turn. [Johnny goes to him and kneels] Come on, my boy, how dost my boy? Art cold? let me alone! Wilt break my heart? And my poor fool is hang'd. No, no, no life! Why should a dog, a horse, a rat have life and thou no life at all? Thou'lt come no more, never, never, never, never! Pray you undo this button—thank you, sir— [Holds the bugle before him] Do you see this? Look on her. Look. Look there, look there!!

[While MacGregor is acting Johnny returns to the coins on the floor and picks them up one by one and looks at them. The room is in absolute silence. A horse and wagon in the street is heard; then steps on the front porch; then a knock at the door. Johnny's Father goes to the door. It is Philip Carmichael and two guards from the Old People's Home. The guards stand at attention at the door]

CARMICHAEL: We heard him playing. He's very sick. We've come to take him back.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Please come in. [He enters. To MacGregor] Mr. MacGregor. [There is no answer]
JOHNNY'S FATHER: [Louder] Mr. MacGregor.
[Goes closer] Mr. MacGregor, Mr. Mac—

[Carmichael hurries over to MacGregor and examines him]

CARMICHAEL: He's dead.

JOHNNY: No, he isn't. He was acting.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: By God, he was the greatest Shakespearean actor of our day.

CARMICHAEL: I'm sorry this had to happen here. JOHNNY'S FATHER: Why not? Why not here? This is where he wanted it to be.

JOHNNY: He was acting, Pa. He isn't dead. [He goes to MacGregor] Are you, Mr. MacGregor? [There is no answer, of course]

CARMICHAEL: We'll take him back.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Here's his bugle. Keep it with him. [Johnny's Father lifts MacGregor and carries him out. The guards carry him up the street. The light of the afternoon sun increases to the same intensity as at the beginning of the play. The horse and wagon goes off. There is a moment of strange silence, and the faint far-away sound of the bugle solo. A knock at the door. Johnny's Father opens the door. It's the young Husband and Wife. The Baby is crying. They come in]

THE WIFE: The kid is tired and sleepy.

JOHNNY'S FATHER: The house is ready. [To Johnny] Get your stuff. [To the Old Lady, in Armenian] We're going. [He gets a straw suitcase from under the couch and throws his poems, books, envelopes, one loaf of bread, and a few of the other items of food into it. The Old Lady puts a shawl around her head and shoulders. Johnny leaves all his junk; takes only the handful of coins. The Baby stops crying. The dog follows Johnny around. The music increases in intensity]

THE HUSBAND: Thank you very much.
THE WIFE: Have you some place to go?
JOHNNY'S FATHER: Yes, we have. Good-by.

THE HUSBAND AND WIFE: Good-by. [They go out of the house to the street]

JOHNNY: Where the hell do we think we're going, Pa?

JOHNNY'S FATHER: Never mind, Johnny. You just follow me.

JOHNNY: I'm not mentioning any names, Pa, but something's wrong somewhere.

[The music grows louder. They walk up the street]

Tennessee Williams

(1914----)

Tothing is so characteristic of Tennessee Williams as his ability to adapt extreme subjectivity to the most objective of the arts. An individualist and a man of wayward impulse, he learned to discipline a volatile temperament for the purpose of calculating dramatic effects and developing a point to relentless conclusion. It was by no means easy for him to work himself out of the tunnel of subjective artistry into the light of orderly judgment and clear vistas.

Although a cosmopolitan by taste and literary interest. Williams is a Southern artist. He is that not merely because he has given us pictures of the South and dealt with its products, chiefly with the overdelicate girls and futile middle-aged women whom Southern writers have so often portrayed, but in his awareness of decadence. A "Southern Gothic" imagination appears in his world of oppressive halflights, anxieties, and outbursts of desperation. There is, it is true, something of D. H. Lawrence in Williams' concern with suppressed sexuality and in his search for liberation through uninhibited animality. Williams is an admirer of Lawrence, and the English writer's influence may be traced in some of the plays. But there is a good deal more of Faulkner in Williams' clinical presentation of warped souls and crass conduct. Only one play, The Glass Menagerie, and one adaptation, of a story by D. H. Lawrence, have more light than darkness.

We may feel, indeed, that Williams would have been quite lost if he had not made a dramatist of himself. He might have become a minor poet and prose writer for a small coterie. That he should have come to write plays for large audiences and so move out of the confines of esoteric art is evidence of a certain quantity of iron in his constitution. He is an artist to his fingertips, yet he has knocked about in the world instead of living in refined seclusion; he has exquisite tastes, yet he has lived and worked in environments where indulgence of those tastes was an unlikely possibility.

Thomas Lanier ("Tennessee") Williams was born of pioneering, Indian-fighting Tennessee ancestry in Columbus, Mississippi. His father was a shoe salesman; his mother was of the Southern aristocracy. Her father, an Episcopalian clergyman who had much to do with the shaping of the boy's mind, was a gentleman with a taste for poetry and literature, as well as for bridge and cocktails. It was in his grandfather's rectory that Williams first observed the Southern women who fill his plays with their genteel anguish. It would be more accurate to say, however, that Williams grew up in a world divided between the cultured life of the rectory and a not particularly prosperous home environment.

The future playwright attended high school in St. Louis and went on to the University of Missouri in 1931. He found it necessary after his sophomore year to take a job in the shoe factory where his father was employed, and he spent two years there. gaining, as he reported later, "valuable insight into the monotony of the white collar worker's life." But the writing fever that made him stay up late at night brought on a nervous collapse. He returned to college in 1936, studying at Washington University in St. Louis, and then went to the University of Iowa to take a Bachelor of Arts degree. Restlessness seizing him, he began to travel across the land, sustaining himself with odd jobs. He was a bellhop in a New Orleans hotel, a teletypist in Jacksonville, Florida, a seventeen-dollar-a-week usher in a New York motion picture theatre, and a waiter and reciter of verses in a Bohemian Greenwich Village night club. Throughout this apprenticeship he wrote continually, experimenting with poetry, stories, and Williams' interest in the theatre began when he saw a performance of Ghosts, with which Alla Nazimova was touring the country. He was then an undergraduate at the University of Missouri. "It was," he recalled later, "one of the things that made me want to write for the theatre." Numerous one-acters and ten full-length plays by the time he wrote his greatest success, A Streetcar Named Desire (1947), testify to his energetic pursuit of a dramatic career. The early full-length plays made no impression and were discarded by the author, but his one-acters, in which the themes of his later long plays are prefigured, attracted attention by 1939. He found an agent, Audrey Wood, who fought hopefully for him, and he won a small cash prize from the Group Theatre for four short pieces. American Blues, dealing with victims of the depression. In January 1940, Theresa Helburn and John Gassner, of the Theatre Guild, gave him a scholarship to their advanced playwrights' seminar and brought the play he wrote that semester to the Guild. Entitled Battle of Angels, it received a production that autumn under the direction of Margaret Webster and the supervision of the Guild's Lawrence Languer. It closed in Boston for repairs after affronting Bostonians with its somewhat lurid story of decadence in a Southern town and of the affair of a D. H. Lawrence hero and a sexually starved woman. But this defeat on the brink of professional success was salved somewhat by American Academy and Rockefeller Fellowship awards, and in 1945, Eddie Dowling, in association with Louis J. Singer, produced The Glass Menagerie in New York after a long tryout period in Chicago. It was a difficult play with which to attract the average playgoer, seemingly too tenuous and depressing as well as too unconventionally constructed. But the magic of the play, movingly conveyed by Laurette Taylor and Julie Haydon in the respective roles of the mother and the daughter, prevailed, and The Glass Menagerie, which won the Drama Critics Circle award, became a notable success.

Subsequently, in 1946, Williams had a disappointing production with You Touched Me, a collaborative adaptation of a D. H. Lawrence story of frustration in an English home. But a year later, he won an ecstatic reception in New York (and later throughout the country and abroad) with A Streetcar Named Desire. It was an unsavory tragedy of a woman's frustration, but its sordid matter of sexual depravity and madness in the New Orleans Latin Quarter was transfigured by poetic dramaturgy and overwhelming compassion. In 1948, Williams faced another disappointment when his next drama of a Southern woman's deterioration, Summer and Smoke, failed to live up to the expectations it had aroused when tried out by Margo Jones in her small arena theatre in Dallas. But the play again proved him a master of sensitive characterization and an able observer of town life in the South. Not at all daunted by critics who feared he was repeating himself and exhausting the theme of Southern decadence, Williams went ahead with the composition of a number of plays with which he hoped to extend the range of his playwriting. But even if these plays prove unsatisfactory, Williams will retain a high place in the American theatre. Several of his one-act plays (such as Portrait of a Madonna and The Lady of Larkspur Lotion) possess much power; his failures (Battle of Angels and Summer and Smoke) contain distinguished writing; and both The Glass Menagerie and A Streetcar Named Desire are among the noteworthy creations of the American drama.

Of the latter two plays, The Glass Menagerie is the more lyrical, if also more tenuous, example of their author's artistry. But it is plain enough that even in this delicate work Williams retains a highly objective attitude toward his picture of a life of failure. He locates his story in the context of the larger world, which demands a wide-awake attitude toward a society that, ailing and torn with the conflict of a Second World War, challenges our intelligence and capacity for action. The narrations that frame the story of the mother, the daughter, and the son form another dimension and supply a measure of objective reality. The "lives of quiet desperation" seem all the more defeated because they are gived in a world that no longer affords them shelter. A mighty wind has arisen and nobody seems to temper it to the shorn lamb, whether it be an aging Southern belle abandoned by her husband or a girl too painfully shy for the coarse-grained world. Although the play is written in a mood of tenderly rueful reminiscence, Williams exhibits here much strength of mind and objectivity. Sympathize though he does with his failures, he recognizes that one cannot accept their quiescence and bumbling. The son pays a tribute of compassion to his mother and sister, but acknowledges the validity of the instinct of self-preservation that made him leave them; he knows, too, that in the great struggle of the times their plight is, in a sense, of minor consequence. The Glass Menagerie is, as had been claimed, a "mood." But it is a mood not mistaken by either the author or the Narrator (and they are actually the same person, since the play is largely autobiographical) for the whole of reality. The author was attached to his characters to such a degree that he could make them move us deeply, but he was also detached enough to locate them in time, place, and necessity. He created The Glass Menagerie as both poet and dramatist, as subjective writer and realist.

Fortunately, Williams found an effective form for this mixed kind of playwriting. He did not, it is true, entirely control his medium, mistaking theatrical virtuosity for effective emphases out of an apparent desire to depart as far as possible from realistic technique. This may be seen in the stage directions he insisted on retaining for the published version—directions which were moderated in Eddie Dowling's excellent production. Yet Williams' feeling for form was essentially right. He used narrations and scenes with emphatic alternation, envisioned the action in the manner of vignettes that soon become alive and charged, and called for the expressive use of visual and musical effects. His work represents a poet who is thoroughly at home in the theatre. The Glass Menagerie exists on several levels; it is a work in which imaginative and realistic elements stand in sound relation to each other. It is not a shattering drama, but it is a notable example of exquisite playwriting that is more tensile than it appears to be on the surface.

THE AUTHOR'S PRODUCTION NOTES

Being a "memory play," The Glass Menagerie can be presented with unusual freedom of convention. Because of its considerably delicate or tenuous material, atmospheric touches and subtleties of direction play a particularly important part. Expressionism and all other unconventional techniques in drama have only one valid aim, and that is a closer approach to truth. When a play employs unconventional techniques, it is not, or certainly shouldn't be, trying to escape its responsibility of dealing with reality, or interpreting experience, but is actually or should be attempting to find a closer approach, a more penetrating and vivid expression of things as they are. The straight realistic play with its genuine frigidaire and authentic ice-cubes, its characters that speak exactly as its audience speaks, corresponds to the academic landscape and has the same virtue of a photographic likeness. Everyone should know nowadays the unimportance of the photographic in art: that truth, life, or reality is an organic thing which the poetic imagination can represent or suggest, in essence, only through transformation, through changing into other forms than those which were merely present in appearance.

These remarks are not meant as a preface only to this particular play. They have to do with a conception of a new, plastic theatre which must take the place of the exhausted theatre of realistic conventions if the theatre is to resume vitality as a part of our culture.

THE SCREEN DEVICE. There is only one important difference between the original and acting version of the play and that is the omission in the latter of the device which I tentatively included in my original script. This device was the use of a screen on which were projected magic-lantern slides bearing images or titles. I do not regret the omission of this device from the present Broadway production. The extraordinary power of Miss Taylor's performance made it suitable to have the utmost simplicity in the physical production. But I think it may be interesting to some readers to see how this device was conceived. So I am putting it into the published manuscript. These images and legends, projected from behind, were cast on a section of wall between the front-room and dining-room areas, which should be indistinguishable from the rest when not in use.

The purpose of this will probably be apparent. It is to give accent to certain values in each scene. Each scene contains a particular point (or several) which is structurally the most important. In an episodic play, such as this, the basic structure or narrative line may be obscured from the audience; the effect may seem fragmentary rather than architectural. This may not be the fault of the play so much as a lack of attention in the audience. The legend or image upon the screen will strengthen the effect of what is merely allusion in the writing and allow the primary point to be made more simply and lightly than if the entire responsibility were on the spoken lines. Aside from this structural value, I think the screen will have a definite emotional appeal, less definable but just as important. An imaginative producer or director may invent many other uses for this device than those indicated in the present script. In fact the possibilities of the device seem much larger to me than the instance of this play can possibly utilize.

THE MUSIC. Another extra-literary accent in this play is provided by the use of music. A single recurring tune, "The Glass Menagerie," is used to give emotional emphasis to suitable passages. This tune is like circus music, not when you are on the grounds or in the immediate vicinity of the parade, but when you are at some distance and very likely thinking of something else. It seems under those circumstances to continue almost interminably and it weaves in and out of your preoccupied consciousness; then it is the lightest, most delicate music in the world and perhaps the saddest. It expresses the surface vivacity of life with the underlying strain of immutable and inexpressible sorrow. When you look at a piece of delicately spun glass you think of two things: how beautiful it is and how easily it can be broken. Both of those ideas should be woven into the recurring tune, which dips in and out of the play as if it were carried on a wind that changes. It serves as a thread of connection and allusion between the narrator with his separate point in time and space and the subject of his story. Between each episode it returns as reference to the emotion. nostalgia, which is the first condition of the play. It is primarily Laura's music and therefore comes out most clearly when the play focuses upon her and the lovely fragility of glass which is her image.

THE LIGHTING. The lighting in the play is not realistic. In keeping with the atmosphere of memory, the stage is dim. Shafts of light are focused on selected areas or actors, sometimes in contradistinction to what is the apparent center. For instance, in the quarrel scene between Tom and Amanda, in which Laura has no active part, the clearest pool of light is on her figure. This is also true of the supper scene, when her silent figure on the sofa should remain the visual center. The light upon Laura should be distinct from the others, having a peculiar pristine clarity such as light used in early religious portraits of female saints or madonnas. A certain correspondence to light in religious paintings, such as El Greco's, where the figures are radiant in atmosphere that is relatively dusky, could be effectively used throughout the play. (It will also permit a more effective use of the screen.) A free, imaginative use of light can be of enormous value in giving a mobile, plastic quality to plays of a more or less static nature.

THE GLASS MENAGERIE

By Tennessee Williams

THE CHARACTERS

AMANDA WINGFIELD, the mother

A little woman of great but confused vitality clinging frantically to another time and place. Her characterization must be carefully created, not copied from type. She is not paranoiac, but her life is paranoia. There is much to admire in Amanda, and as much to love and pity as there is to laugh at. Certainly she has endurance and a kind of heroism, and though her foolishness makes her unwittingly cruel at times, there is tenderness in her slight person.

LAURA WINGFIELD, her daughter

Amanda, having failed to establish contact with reality, continues to live vitally in her illusions, but Laura's situation is even graver. A childhood illness has left her crippled, one leg slightly shorter than the other, and held in a brace. This defect need not be more than suggested on the stage. Stemming from this, Laura's separation increases till she is like a piece of her own glass collection, too exquisitely fragile to move from the shelf.

TOM WINGFIELD, her son

And the narrator of the play. A poet with a job in a warehouse. His nature is not remorseless, but to escape from a trap he has to act without pity.

JIM O'CONNOR, the gentleman caller A nice, ordinary, young man.

SCENE

An Alley in St. Louis

PART I. Preparation for a Gentleman Caller. PART II. The Gentleman calls.

Time: Now and the Past.

SCENE I.

The Wingfield apartment is in the rear of the building, one of those vast hive-like conglomerations of cellular living-units that flower as warty growths in overcrowded urban centers of lower middle-class population and are symptomatic of the impulse of this largest and fundamentally enslaved section of American society to avoid fluidity and differentiation and to exist and function as one interfused mass of automatism.

The apartment faces an alley and is entered by a fire-escape, a structure whose name is a touch of accidental poetic truth, for all of these huge buildings are always burning with the slow and implacable fires of human desperation. The fire-escape is included in the set—that is, the landing of it and steps descending from it.

The scene is memory and is therefore nonrealistic. Memory takes a lot of poetic license. It omits some details; others are exaggerated, according to the emotional value of the articles it touches, for memory is seated predominantly in the heart. The interior is therefore rather dim and poetic.

At the rise of the curtain, the audience is faced with the dark, grim rear wall of the Wingfield tenement. This building, which runs parallel to the footlights, is flanked on both sides by dark, narrow alleys which run into murky canyons of tangled clotheslines, garbage cans and the sinister lattice-work of neighboring fire-escapes. It is up and down these side alleys that exterior entrances and exits are made, during the play. At the end of Tom's opening commentary, the dark tenement wall slowly reveals (by means of a transparency) the interior of the ground floor Wingfield apartment.

Downstage is the living room, which also serves as a sleeping room for Laura, the sofa unfolding to make her bed. Upstage, center, and divided by a wide arch or second proscenium with transparent faded portieres (or second curtain), is the dining room. In an old-fashioned what-not in the living room are seen scores of transparent glass animals. A blown-up photograph of the father hangs on the wall of the living room, facing the audience, to the left of the archway. It is the face of a very handsome young man in a doughboy's First World War cap. He is gallantly smiling, ineluctably smiling, as if to say, "I will be smiling forever."

The audience hears and sees the opening scene in the dining room through both the transparent fourth wall of the building and the transparent gauze portieres of the dining-room arch. It is during this revealing scene that the fourth wall slowly ascends, out of sight. This transparent exterior wall is not brought down again until the very end of the play, during Tom's final speech.

The narrator is an undisguised convention of the play. He takes whatever license with dramatic convention as is convenient to his purposes.

Tom enters dressed as a merchant sailor from alley, stage left, and strolls across the front of the stage to the fire-escape. There he stops and lights a cigarette. He addresses the audience.

TOM: Yes, I have tricks in my pocket, I have things up my sleeve. But I am the opposite of a stage magician. He gives you illusion that has the appearance of truth. I give you truth in the pleasant disguise of illusion.

To begin with, I turn back time. I reverse it to that quaint period, the thirties, when the huge middle class of America was matriculating in a school for the blind. Their eyes had failed them, or they had failed their eyes, and so they were having their fingers pressed forcibly down on the fiery Braille alphabet of a dissolving economy.

In Spain there was revolution. Here there was only shouting and confusion.

In Spain there was Guernica. Here there were disturbances of labor, sometimes pretty violent, in otherwise peaceful cities such as Chicago, Cleveland, Saint Louis . . .

This is the social background of the play.

[MUSIC]

The play is memory.

Being a memory play, it is dimly lighted, it is sentimental, it is not realistic.

In memory everything seems to happen to music. That explains the fiddle in the wings.

I am the narrator of the play, and also a character in it.

The other characters are my mother, Amanda, my sister, Laura, and a gentleman caller who appears in the final scenes.

He is the most realistic character in the play, being an emissary from a world of reality that we were somehow set apart from.

But since I have a poet's weakness for symbols, I am using this character also as a symbol; he is the long delayed but always expected something that we live for.

There is a fifth character in the play who doesn't appear except in this larger-than-life-size photograph over the mantel.

This is our father who left us a long time ago.

He was a telephone man who fell in love with long distances; he gave up his job with the telephone company and skipped the light fantastic out of town . . .

The last we heard of him was a picture post-card from Mazatlan, on the Pacific coast of Mexico, containing a message of two words—

"Hello- Good-bye!" and no address.

I think the rest of the play will explain itself. . . . [Amanda's voice becomes audible through the portieres]

[LEGEND ON SCREEN: "OÙ SONT LES NEIGES"]

He divides the portieres and enters the upstage area. Amanda and Laura are seated at a drop-leat table. Eating is indicated by gestures without food or utensils. Amanda faces the audience. Tom and Laura are seated in profile. The interior has lit up softly and through the scrim we see Amanda and Laura seated at the table in the upstage area.

AMANDA: [Calling] Tom?

TOM: Yes, Mother.

AMANDA: We can't say grace until you come to the table!

TOM: Coming, Mother. [He bows slightly and withdraws, reappearing a few moments later in his place at the table]

AMANDA: [To her son] Honey, don't push with your fingers. If you have to push with something, the thing to push with is a crust of bread. And chew—chew! Animals have sections in their stomachs which enable them to digest food without mastication, but human beings are supposed to chew their food before they swallow it down. Eat food leisurely, son, and really enjoy it. A well-cooked meal has lots of delicate flavors that have to be held in the mouth for appreciation. So chew your food and give your salivary glands a chance to function!

[Tom deliberately lays his imaginary fork down and pushes his chair back from the table]

TOM: I haven't enjoyed one bite of this dinner because of your constant directions on how to eat it. It's you that make me rush through meals with your hawk-like attention to every bite I take. Sickening—spoils my appetite—all this discussion of—animals' secretion—salivary glands—mastication!

AMANDA: [Lightly] Temperament like a Metropolitan star! [He rises and crosses downstage] You're not excused from the table.

TOM: I'm getting a cigarette.

AMANDA: You smoke too much. [Laura rises]

LAURA: I'll bring in the blanc mange. [He remains standing with his cigarette by the portieres during the following]

AMANDA: [Rising] No, sister, no, sister—you be the lady this time and I'll be the darky.

LAURA: I'm already up.

AMANDA: Resume your seat, little sister—I want you to stay fresh and pretty—for gentlemen callers!

LAURA: I'm not expecting any gentlemen callers.

AMANDA: [Crossing out to kitchenette. Airily] Sometimes they come when they are least expected! Why, I remember one Sunday afternoon in Blue Mountain—[Enters kitchenette]

TOM: I know what's coming! LAURA: Yes. But let her tell it.

TOM: Again?

LAURA: She loves to tell it.

[Amanda returns with bowl of dessert]

AMANDA: One Sunday afternoon in Blue Mountain—your mother received—seventeen—gentlemen callers! Why, sometimes there weren't chairs enough to accommodate them all. We had to send the nigger over to bring in folding chairs from the parish house.

TOM: [Remaining at portieres] How did you entertain those gentlemen callers?

AMANDA: I understood the art of conversation!

том: I bet you could talk.

AMANDA: Girls in those days knew how to talk, I can tell you.

TOM: Yes?

[IMAGE: Amanda as a girl on a porch, greeting callers]

AMANDA: They knew how to entertain their gentlemen callers. It wasn't enough for a girl to be possessed of a pretty face and a graceful figure—although I wasn't slighted in either respect. She also needed to have a nimble wit and a tongue to meet all occasions.

TOM: What did you talk about?

AMANDA: Things of importance going on in the world! Never anything coarse or common or vulgar. [She addresses Tom as though he were seated in the vacant chair at the table though he remains by portieres. He plays this scene as though he held the book] My callers were gentlemen—all! Among my callers were some of the most prominent young planters of the Mississippi Delta—planters and sons of planters!

[Tom motions for music and a spot of light on Amanda. Her eyes lift, her face glows, her voice becomes rich and elegiac]

[SCREEN LEGEND: "OÙ SONT LES NEIGES"]

There was young Champ Laughlin who later became vice-president of the Delta Planters Bank.

Hadley Stevenson who was drowned in Moon Lake and left his widow one hundred and fifty thousand in Government bonds.

There were the Cutrere brothers, Wesley and Bates. Bates was one of my bright particular beaux! He got in a quarrel with that wild Wainwright boy. They shot it out on the floor of Moon Lake Casino. Bates was shot through the stomach. Died in the ambulance on his way to Memphis. His widow was also well-provided for, came into eight or ten thousand acres, that's all. She married him on the rebound—never loved her—carried my picture on him the night he died!

And there was that boy that every girl in the Delta had set her cap for! That beautiful, brilliant young Fitzhugh boy from Greene County!

TOM: What did he leave his widow?

AMANDA: He never married! Gracious, you talk as though all of my old admirers had turned up their toes to the daisies!

TOM: Isn't this the first you've mentioned that still survives?

AMANDA: That Fitzhugh boy went North and made a fortune—came to be known as the Wolf of Wall Street! He had the Midas touch, whatever he touched turned to gold!

And I could have been Mrs. Duncan J. Fitzhugh, mind you! But—I picked your father!

LAURA: [Rising] Mother, let me clear the table.

AMANDA: No, dear, you go in front and study your typewriter chart. Or practice your shorthand a little. Stay fresh and pretty!—It's almost time for our gentlemen callers to start arriving. [She flounces girlishly toward the kitchenette] How many do you suppose we're going to entertain this afternoon?

[Tom throws down the paper and jumps up with a groan]

LAURA: [Alone in the dining room] I don't believe we're going to receive any, Mother.

AMANDA: [Reappearing, airily] What? No one—not one? You must be joking! [Laura nervously echoes her laugh. She slips in a fugitive manner through the half-open portieres and draws them gently behind her. A shaft of very clear light is thrown on her face against the faded tapestry of the curtains. MUSIC: "THE GLASS MENAGERIE" UNDER FAINTLY. Lightly] Not one gentleman caller? It can't be true! There must be a flood, there must have been a tornado!

LAURA: It isn't a flood, it's not a tornado, Mother. I'm just not popular like you were in Blue Mountain. . . . [Tom utters another groan. Laura glances at him with a faint, apologetic smile. Her voice catching a little] Mother's afraid I'm going to be an old maid.

THE SCENE DIMS OUT WITH "GLASS MENAGERIE"

Music

SCENE II.

"Laura, Haven't You Ever Liked Some Boy?"
On the dark stage the screen is lighted with the image of blue roses. Gradually Laura's figure becomes apparent and the screen goes out. The music subsides.

Laura is seated in the delicate ivory chair at the small clawfoot table. She wears a dress of soft violet material for a kimono—her hair tied back from her forehead with a ribbon. She is washing and polishing her collection of glass.

Amanda appears on the fire-escape steps. At the sound of her ascent, Laura catches her breath, thrusts the bowl of ornaments away and seats herself stiffly before the diagram of the typewriter keyboard as though it held her spellbound. Something has happened to Amanda. It is written in her face as she climbs to the landing: a look that is grim and hopeless and a little absurd. She has on one of those cheap or imitation velvety-looking cloth coats with imitation fur collar. Her hat is five or six years old, one of those dreadful cloche hats that were worn in the late twenties and she is clasping an enormous black patent-leather pocketbook with nickel clasps and initials. This is her full-dress outfit, the one she usually wears to the D.A.R. Before entering she looks through the door. She purses her lips, opens her eyes very wide, rolls them upward and shakes her head. Then she slowly lets herself in the door. Seeing her mother's expression Laura touches her lips with a nervous gesture.

LAURA: Hello, Mother, I was— [She makes a nervous gesture toward the chart on the wall. Amanda leans against the shut door and stares at Laura with a martyred look]

AMANDA: Deception? Deception? [She slowly removes her hat and gloves, continuing the sweet suffering stare. She lets the hat and gloves fall on the floor—a bit of acting]

[Amanda slowly opens her purse and removes a dainty white handkerchief which she shakes out delicately and delicately touches to her lips and nostrils] Didn't you go to the D.A.R. meeting, Mother?

AMANDA: [Faintly, almost inaudibly]—No.—No. [Then more forcibly] I did not have the strength—to go to the D.A.R. In fact, I did not have the courage! I wanted to find a hole in the ground and hide myself in it forever! [She crosses slowly to the wall and removes the diagram of the typewriter keyboard. She holds it in front of her for a second, staring at it sweetly and sorrowfully—then bites her lips and tears it in two pieces]

LAURA: [Faintly] Why did you do that, Mother? [Amanda repeats the same procedure with the chart of the Gregg Alphabet] Why are you—

AMANDA: Why? Why? How old are you, Laura? LAURA: Mother, you know my age.

AMANDA: I thought that you were an adult; it seems that I was mistaken. [She crosses slowly to the sofa and sinks down and stares at Laura]

LAURA: Please don't stare at me, Mother.

[Amanda closes her eyes and lowers her head. Count ten]

AMANDA: What are we going to do, what is going to become of us, what is the future? [Count ten]

LAURA: Has something happened, Mother? [Amanda draws a long breath and takes out the handkerchief again. Dabbing process] Mother, has—something happened?

AMANDA: I'll be all right in a minute, I'm just be-wildered—[Count five]—by life. . . .

LAURA: Mother, I wish that you would tell me what's happened!

AMANDA: As you know, I was supposed to be inducted into my office at the D.A.R. this afternoon. [BMAGE: A SWARM OF TYPEWRITERS] But I stopped off at Rubicam's Business College to speak to your teachers about your having a cold and ask them what progress they thought you were making down there.

LAURA: Oh. . . .

AMANDA: I went to the typing instructor and introduced myself as your mother. She didn't know who you were. Wingfield, she said. We don't have any such student enrolled at the school!

I assured her she did, that you have been going to classes since early in January.

"I wonder," she said, "if you could be talking about that terribly shy little girl who dropped out of school after only a few days' attendance?"

"No," I said, "Laura, my daughter, has been going to school every day for the past six weeks!"

"Excuse me," she said. She took the attendance book out and there was your name, unmistakably printed, and all the dates you were absent until they decided that you had dropped out of school.

I still said, "No, there must have been some mistake! There must have been some mix-up in the records!"

And she said, "No—I remember her perfectly now. Her hands shook so that she couldn't hit the right keys! The first time we gave a speed-test, she broke down completely—was sick at the stomach and almost had to be carried into the wash-room! After that morning she never showed up any more. We phoned the house but never got any answer—while I was working at Famous and Barr, I suppose, demonstrating those—Oh!"

I felt so weak I could barely keep on my feet!

I had to sit down while they got me a glass of water!

Fifty dollars' tuition, all of our plans—my hopes and ambitions for you—just gone up the spout, just gone up the spout like that. [Laura draws a long breath and gets awkwardly to her feet. She crosses to the victrola and winds it up] What are you doing?

LAURA: Oh! [She releases the handle and returns to her seat]

AMANDA: Laura, where have you been going when you've gone out pretending that you were going to business college?

LAURA: I've just been going out walking.

AMANDA: That's not true.

LAURA: It is. I just went walking.

AMANDA: Walking? Walking? In winter? Deliberately courting pneumonia in that light coat? Where did you walk to, Laura?

LAURA: All sorts of places—mostly in the park.

AMANDA: Even after you'd started catching that cold?

LAURA: It was the lesser of two evils, Mother. [IMAGE: WINTER SCENE IN PARK] I couldn't go back up. I—threw up—on the floor!

AMANDA: From half past seven till after five every day you mean to tell me you walked around in the park, because you wanted to make me think that you were still going to Rubicam's Business College?

LAURA: It wasn't as bad as it sounds. I went inside places to get warmed up.

AMANDA: Inside where?

LAURA: I went in the art museum and the birdhouses at the Zoo. I visited the penguins every day! Sometimes I did without lunch and went to the movies. Lately I've been spending most of my afternoons in the Jewel-box, that big glass house where they raise the tropical flowers.

AMANDA: You did all this to deceive me, just for deception? [Laura looks down] Why?

LAURA: Mother, when you're disappointed, you get that awful suffering look on your face, like the picture of Jesus' mother in the museum!

AMANDA: Hush!

LAURA: I couldn't face it.

[Pause. A whisper of strings]

[LEGEND: "THE CRUST OF HUMILITY"]

AMANDA: [Hopelessly fingering the huge pocket-book] So what are we going to do the rest of our lives? Stay home and watch the parades go by? Amuse ourselves with the glass menagerie, darling? Eternally play those worn-out phonograph records your father left as a painful reminder of him?

We won't have a business career—we've given that up because it gave us nervous indigestion! [Laughs wearily] What is there left but dependency all our lives? I know so well what becomes of unmarried women who aren't prepared to occupy a position. I've seen such pitiful cases in the South—barely tolerated spinsters living upon the grudging patronage of sister's husband or brother's wife!—stuck away in some little mouse-trap of a room—encouraged by one in-law to visit another—little birdlike women without any nest—eating the crust of humility all their life!

Is that the future that we've mapped out for ourselves?

I swear it's the only alternative I can think of! It isn't a very pleasant alternative, is it?

Of course—some girls do marry.

[Laura twists her hands nervously]

Haven't you ever liked some boy?

LAURA: Yes. I liked one once. [Rises] I came across his picture a while ago.

AMANDA: [With some interest] He gave you his picture?

LAURA: No, it's in the year-book.

AMANDA: [Disappointed] Oh—a high-school boy. [SCREEN IMAGE: JIM AS HIGH-SCHOOL HERO BEARING A SILVER CUP]

LAURA: Yes. His name was Jim. [Laura lifts the heavy annual from the claw-foot table] Here he is in The Pirates of Penzance.

AMANDA: [Absently] The what?

LAURA: The operetta the senior class put on. He had a wonderful voice and we sat across the aisle from each other Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays in the Aud. Here he is with the silver cup for debating! See his grin?

AMANDA: [Absently] He must have had a jolly disposition.

LAURA: He used to call me-Blue Roses.

[IMAGE: BLUE ROSES]

AMANDA: Why did he call you such a name as that?

LAURA: When I had that attack of pleurosis—he asked me what was the matter when I came back. I said pleurosis—he thought that I said Blue Roses! So that's what he always called me after that. Whenever he saw me, he'd holler, "Hello, Blue Roses!" I didn't care for the girl that he went out with. Emily Meisenbach. Emily was the best-dressed girl at Soldan. She never struck me, though, as being sincere . . . It says in the Personal Section—they're engaged. That's—six years ago! They must be married by now.

AMANDA: Girls that aren't cut out for business careers usually wind up married to some nice man. [Gets up with a spark of revival] Sister, that's what you'll do!

[Laura utters a startled, doubtful laugh. She reaches quickly for a piece of glass]

LAURA: But, Mother-

AMANDA: Yes? [Crossing to photograph]

LAURA: [In a tone of frightened apology] I'm-crippled!

[IMAGE: SCREEN]

AMANDA: Nonsense! Laura, I've told you never, never to use that word. Why, you're not crippled, you just have a little defect—hardly noticeable, even! When people have some slight disadvantage like that, they cultivate other things to make up for it—develop charm—and vivacity—and—charm! That's all you have to do! [She turns again to the photograph] One thing your father had plenty of—was charm!

[Tom motions to the fiddle in the wings]

THE SCENE FADES OUT WITH MUSIC

SCENE III.

LEGEND ON SCREEN: "AFTER THE FIASCO—" TOM speaks from the fire-escape landing.

TOM: After the fiasco at Rubicam's Business College, the idea of getting a gentleman caller for Laura began to play a more and more important part in Mother's calculations.

It became an obsession. Like some archetype of the universal unconscious, the image of the gentleman caller haunted our small apartment. . . .

[IMAGE: YOUNG MAN AT DOOR WITH FLOWERS] An evening at home rarely passed without some allusion to this image, this spectre, this hope . . .

Even when he wasn't mentioned, his presence hung in Mother's preoccupied look and in my sister's frightened, apologetic manner—hung like a sentence passed upon the Wingfields!

Mother was a woman of action as well as words. She began to take logical steps in the planned direction.

Late that winter and in the early spring—realizing that extra money would be needed to properly feather the nest and plume the bird—she conducted a vigorous campaign on the telephone, roping in subscribers to one of those magazines for matrons called The Home-maker's Companion, the type of journal that features the serialized sublimations of ladies of letters who think in terms of delicate cuplike breasts, slim, tapering waists, rich, creamy thighs, eyes like wood-smoke in autumn, fingers that soothe and caress like strains of music, bodies as powerful as Etruscan sculpture.

[Amanda enters with phone on long extension cord. She is spotted in the dim stage]

AMANDA: Ida Scott? This is Amanda Wingfield! We missed you at the D.A.R. last Monday!

I said to myself: She's probably suffering with that sinus condition! How is that sinus condition?

Horrors! Heaven have mercy!—You're a Christian martyr, yes, that's what you are, a Christian martyr!

Well, I just now happened to notice that your subscription to the Companion's about to expire! Yes, it expires with the next issue, honey!—just when that wonderful new serial by Bessie Mae Hopper is getting off to such an exciting start. Oh, honey, it's something that you can't miss! You remember how Gone With the Wind took everybody by storm? You simply couldn't go out if you hadn't read it. All everybody talked was Scarlett O'Hara. Well, this is a book that critics already compare to Gone With the Wind. It's the Gone With the Wind of the post-World War generation!—What?—Burning?—Oh, honey, don't let them burn, go take a look in the oven and I'll hold the wire! Heavens—I think she's hung up!

DIM OUT

[LEGEND ON SCREEN: "YOU THINK I'M IN LOVE WITH CONTINENTAL SHOEMAKERS?"]

[Before the stage is lighted, the violent voices of Tom and Amanda are heard. They are quarreling behind the portieres. In front of them stands Laura with clenched hands and panicky expression. A clear pool of light on her figure throughout this scene]

TOM: What in Christ's name am I—AMANDA: [Shrilly] Don't you use that—

TOM: Supposed to do!

AMANDA: Expression! Not in my-

TOM: Ohhh!

AMANDA: Presence! Have you gone out of your senses?

TOM: I have, that's true, driven out!

AMANDA: What is the matter with you, you—big—big—idiot!

TOM: Look!—I've got no thing, no single thing—AMANDA: Lower your voice!

TOM: In my life here that I can call my own! Everything is—

AMANDA: Stop that shouting!

TOM: Yesterday you confiscated my books! You had the nerve to—

AMANDA: I took that horrible novel back to the library—yes! That hideous book by that insane Mr. Lawrence. [Tom laughs wildly] I cannot control the output of diseased minds or people who cater to them—[Tom laughs still more wildly] BUT I WON'T ALLOW SUCH FILTH BROUGHT INTO MY HOUSE! No, no, no, no, no!

TOM: House, house! Who pays rent on it, who makes a slave of himself to-

AMANDA: [Fairly screeching] Don't you DARE to-

TOM: No, no, I mustn't say things! I've got to just—

AMANDA: Let me tell you-

TOM: I don't want to hear any more! [He tears the portieres open. The upstage area is lit with a turgid smoky red glow]

[Amanda's hair is in metal curlers and she wears a very old bathrobe, much too large for her slight figure, a relic of the faithless Mr. Wingfield. An upright typewriter and a wild disarray of manuscripts is on the drop-leaf table. The quarrel was probably precipitated by Amanda's interruption of his creative labor. A chair lying overthrown on the floor. Their gesticulating shadows are cast on the ceiling by the fiery glow?

AMANDA: You will hear more, you-

TOM: No, I won't hear more, I'm going out!

AMANDA: You come right back in— TOM: Out, out, out! Because I'm—

AMANDA: Come back here, Tom Wingfield! I'm not through talking to you!

том: Oh, go-

LAURA: [Desperately]—Tom!

AMANDA: You're going to listen, and no more insolence from you! I'm at the end of my patience!

[He comes back toward her]

TOM: What do you think I'm at? Aren't I supposed to have any patience to reach the end of, Mother? I know, I know. It seems unimportant to you, what I'm doing—what I want to do—having a little difference between them! You don't think that—

AMANDA: I think you've been doing things that you're ashamed of. That's why you act like this. I don't believe that you go every night to the movies. Nobody goes to the movies night after night. Nobody in their right minds goes to the movies as often as you pretend to. People don't go to the movies at nearly midnight, and movies don't let out at two A.M. Come in stumbling. Muttering to yourself like a maniac! You get three hours' sleep and then go to work. Oh, I can picture the way you're doing down there. Moping, doping, because you're in no condition.

TOM: [Wildly] No, I'm in no condition!

AMANDA: What right have you got to jeopardize your job? Jeopardize the security of us all? How do you think we'd manage if you were—

TOM: Listen! You think I'm crazy about the warehouse? [He bends fiercely toward her slight figure] You think I'm in love with the Continental Shoemakers? You think I want to spend fifty-five years down there in that-celotex interior! withfluorescent-tubes! Look! I'd rather somebody picked up a crowbar and battered out my brainsthan go back mornings! I go! Every time you come in yelling that God damn "Rise and Shine!" "Rise and Shine!" I say to myself, "How lucky dead people are!" But I get up. I go! For sixty-five dollars a month I give up all that I dream of doing and being ever! And you say self—self's all I ever think of. Why, listen, if self is what I thought of, Mother, I'd be where he is-GONE! [Pointing to father's picture] As far as the system of transportation reaches! [He starts past her. She grabs his arm] Don't grab at me, Mother!

AMANDA: Where are you going? TOM: I'm going to the movies! AMANDA: I don't believe that lie!

TOM: [Crouching toward her, overtowering her tiny figure. She backs away, gasping I'm going to opium dens! Yes, opium dens, dens of vice and criminals' hang-outs, Mother. I've joined the Hogan gang, I'm a hired assassin, I carry a tommy-gun in a violin case! I run a string of cat-houses in the Valley! They call me Killer, Killer Wingfield, I'm leading a double-life, a simple, honest warehouse worker by day, by night a dynamic czar of the underworld, Mother. I go to gambling casinos, I spin away fortunes on the roulette table! I wear a patch over one eye and a false mustache, sometimes I put on green whiskers. On those occasions they call me-El Diablo! Oh, I could tell you things to make you sleepless! My enemies plan to dynamite this place. They're going to blow us all sky-high some night! I'll be glad, very happy, and so will you! You'll go up, up on a broomstick, over Blue Mountain with seventeen gentlemen callers! You ugly-babbling old-witch. . . . [He goes through a series of violent, clumsy movements, seizing his overcoat, lunging to the door, pulling it fiercely open. The women watch him, aghast. His arm catches in the sleeve of the coat as he struggles to pull it on. For a moment he is pinioned by the bulky garment. With an outraged groan he tears the coat off again, splitting the shoulder of it, and hurls it across the room. It strikes against the shelf of Laura's glass collection, there is a tinkle of shattering glass. Laura cries out as if wounded

[MUSIC. LEGEND: "THE GLASS MENAGERIE"]
LAURA: [Shrilly] My glass!—menagerie. . . .
[She covers her face and turns away]

[But Amanda is still stunned and stupefied by the "ugly witch" so that she barely notices this occurrence. Now she recovers her speech]

AMANDA: [In an awful voice] I won't speak to you—until you apologize! [She crosses through portieres and draws them together behind her. Tom is left with Laura. Laura clings weakly to the mantel with her face averted. Tom stares at her stupidly for a moment. Then he crosses to shelf. Drops awkwardly on his knees to collect the fallen glass, glancing at Laura as if he would speak but couldn't]

"The Glass Menagerie" steals in as

THE SCENE DIMS OUT

SCENE IV.

The interior is dark. Faint light in the alley. A deep-voiced bell in a church is tolling the hour of five as the scene commences.

Tom appears at the top of the alley. After each solemn boom of the bell in the tower, he shakes a little noise-maker or rattle as if to express the tiny spasm of man in contrast to the sustained power and dignity of the Almighty. This and the unsteadiness of his advance make it evident that he has been drinking. As he climbs the few steps to the fireescape landing light steals up inside. Laura appears in night-dress, observing Tom's empty bed in the front room. Tom fishes in his pockets for door-key, removing a motley assortment of articles in the search, including a perfect shower of movie-ticket stubs and an empty bottle. At last he finds the key, but just as he is about to insert it, it slips from his fingers. He strikes a match and crouches below the door.

TOM: [Bitterly] One crack—and it falls through! [Laura opens the door]

LAURA: Tom! Tom, what are you doing?

TOM: Looking for a door-key.

LAURA: Where have you been all this time?

TOM: I have been to the movies.

LAURA: All this time at the movies?

TOM: There was a very long program. There was a Garbo picture and a Mickey Mouse and a travelogue and a newsreel and a preview of coming attractions. And there was an organ solo and a collection for the milk-fund—simultaneously—which ended up in a terrible fight between a fat lady and an usher!

LAURA: [Innocently] Did you have to stay through everything?

TOM: Of course! And, oh, I forgot! There was a big stage show! The headliner on this stage show was Malvolio the Magician. He performed wonderful tricks, many of them, such as pouring water back and forth between pitchers. First it turned to wine and then it turned to beer and then it turned to whiskey. I know it was whiskey it finally turned into because he needed somebody to come up out of the audience to help him, and I came up-both shows! It was Kentucky Straight Bourbon. A very generous fellow, he gave souvenirs. [He pulls from his back pocket a shimmering rainbow-colored scarf] He gave me this. This is his magic scarf. You can have it, Laura. You wave it over a canary cage and you get a bowl of gold-fish. You wave it over the gold-fish bowl and they fly away canaries. . . . But the wonderfullest trick of all was the coffin trick. We nailed him into a coffin and he got out of the coffin without removing one nail. [He has come inside] There is a trick that would come in handy for me—get me out of this 2 by 4 situation. [Flops onto bed and starts removing shoes]

LAURA: Tom-Shhh!

TOM: What're you shushing me for? LAURA: You'll wake up Mother.

TOM: Goody, goody! Pay 'er back for all those "Rise an' Shines." [Lies down, grouning] You know it don't take much intelligence to get yourself into a nailed-up coffin, Laura. But who in hell ever got himself out of one without removing one nail?

[As if in answer, the futher's grinning photograph lights up]

SCENE DIMS OUT

[Immediately following: The church bell is heard striking six. At the sixth stroke the alarm clock goes off in Amanda's room, and after a few moments we hear her calling: "Rise and Shine! Rise and Shine! Laura, go tell your brother to rise and shine!"]

TOM: [Sitting up slowly] I'll rise—but I won't shine.

[The light increases]

AMANDA: Laura, tell your brother his coffee is ready.

[Laura slips into front room]

LAURA: Tom!—It's nearly seven. Don't make Mother nervous. [He stares at her stupidly. Beseechingly] Tom, speak to Mother this morning. Make up with her, apologize, speak to her!

TOM: She won't to me. It's her that started not speaking.

LAURA: If you just say you're sorry she'll start speaking.

TOM: Her not speaking—is that such a tragedy? LAURA: Please—please!

AMANDA: [Calling from kitchenette] Laura, are you going to do what I asked you to do, or do I have to get dressed and go out myself?

LAURA: Going, going—soon as I get on my coat! ishe pulls on a shapeless felt hat with nervous, jerky movement, pleadingly glancing at Tom. Rushes awkwardly for coat. The coat is one of Amanda's, inaccurately made-over, the sleeves too short for Laura] Butter and what clse?

AMANDA: [Entering upstage] Just butter. Tell them to charge it.

LAURA: Mother, they make such faces when I do that.

AMANDA: Sticks and stones can break our bones, but the expression on Mr. Garfinkel's face won't harm us! Tell your brother his coffee is getting cold.

LAURA: [At door] Do what I asked you, will you, will you, Tom?

[He looks sullenly away]

AMANDA: Laura, go now or just don't go at all!

LAURA: [Rushing out] Going—going! [A second later she cries out. Tom springs up and crosses to door. Amanda rushes anxiously in. Tom opens the door] том: Laura?

LAURA: I'm all right. I slipped, but I'm all right.

AMANDA: [Peering anxiously after her] If anyone breaks a leg on those fire-escape steps, the landlord ought to be sued for every cent he possesses! [She shuts door. Remembers she isn't speaking and returns to other room]

[As Tom enters listlessly for his coffee, she turns her back to him and stands rigidly facing the window on the gloomy gray vault of the areaway. Its light on her face with its aged but childish features is cruelly sharp, satirical as a Daumier print]

[MUSIC UNDER: "AVE MARIA"]

[Tom glances sheepishly but sullenly at her averted figure and slumps at the table. The coffee is scalding hot; he sips it and gasps and spits it back in the cup. At his gasp, Amanda catches her breath and half turns. Then catches herself and turns back to window. Tom blows on his coffee, glancing sidewise at his mother. She clears her throat. Tom clears his. He starts to rise. Sinks back down again, scratches his head, clears his throat again. Amanda coughs. Tom raises his cup in both hands to blow on it, his eyes staring over the rim of it at his mother for several moments. Then he slowly sets the cup down and awkwardly and hesitantly rises from the chair]

TOM: [Hoarsely] Mother. I—I apologize, Mother. [Amanda draws a quick, shuddering breath. Her face works grotesquely. She breaks into childlike tears] I'm sorry for what I said, for everything that I said, I didn't mean it.

AMANDA: [Sobbingly] My devotion has made me a witch and so I make myself hateful to my children! TOM: No, you don't.

AMANDA: I worry so much, don't sleep, it makes me nervous!

TOM: [Gently] I understand that,

AMANDA: I've had to put up a solitary battle all these years. But you're my right-hand bower! Don't fall down, don't fail!

TOM: [Gently] I try, Mother.

AMANDA: [With great enthusiasm] Try and you will succeed! [The notion makes her breathless] Why, you—you're just full of natural endowments! Both of my children—they're unusual children! Don't you think I know it? I'm so—proud! Happy and—feel I've—so much to be thankful for but— Promise me one thing, Son!

TOM: What, Mother?

AMANDA: Promise, son, you'll—never be a drunk-ard!

TOM: [Turns to her grinning] I will never be a drunkard, Mother.

AMANDA: That's what frightened me so, that you'd be drinking! Eat a bowl of Purina!

TOM: Just coffee, Mother.

AMANDA: Shredded wheat biscuit?

TOM: No. No, Mother, just coffee.

AMANDA: You can't put in a day's work on an empty stomach. You've got ten minutes—don't gulp! Drinking too-hot liquids makes cancer of the stomach. . . . Put cream in.

TOM: No, thank you. AMANDA: To cool it.

TOM: No! No, thank you, I want it black.

AMANDA: I know, but it's not good for you. We have to do all that we can to build ourselves up. In these trying times we live in, all that we have to cling to is—each other. . . . That's why it's so important to— Tom, I— I sent out your sister so I could discuss something with you. If you hadn't spoken I would have spoken to you. [Sits down]

TOM: [Gently] What is it, Mother, that you want to discuss?

AMANDA: Laural

[Tom puts his cup down slowly]
[LEGEND ON SCREEN: "LAURA"]
[MUSIC: "THE GLASS MENAGERIE"]

TOM: -Oh.-Laura . . .

AMANDA: [Touching his sleeve] You know how Laura is. So quiet but—still water runs deep! She notices things and I think she—broods about them. [Tom looks up] A few days ago I came in and she was crying.

TOM: What about? AMANDA: You. TOM: Me?

AMANDA: She has an idea that you're not happy here

TOM: What gave her that idea?

AMANDA: What gives her any idea? However, you do act strangely. I—I'm not criticizing, understand that! I know your ambitions do not lie in the warehouse, that like everybody in the whole wide world—you've had to—make sacrifices, but—Tom—Tom—life's not easy, it calls for—Spartan endurance! There's so many things in my heart that I cannot describe to you! I've never told you but I—loved your father. . . .

TOM: [Gently] I know that, Mother.

AMANDA: And you—when I see you taking after his ways! Staying out late—and—well, you had been drinking the night you were in that—terrifying condition! Laura says that you hate the apartment and that you go out nights to get away from it! Is that true, Tom?

TOM: No. You say there's so much in your heart that you can't describe to me. That's true of me, too. There's so much in my heart that I can't describe to you! So let's respect each other's—

AMANDA: But, why—why, Tom—are you always so restless? Where do you go to, nights?

TOM: I-go to the movies.

AMANDA: Why do you go to the movies so much, Tom?

TOM: I go to the movies because—I like adventure. Adventure is something I don't have much of at work, so I go to the movies.

AMANDA: But, Tom, you go to the movies entirely too much!

TOM: I like a lot of adventure.

[Amanda looks baffled, then hurt. As the familiar inquisition resumes he becomes hard and impatient again. Amanda slips back into her querulous attitude toward him]

[IMAGE ON SCREEN: SAILING VESSEL WITH JOLLY ROGER]

AMANDA: Most young men find adventure in their careers.

TOM: Then most young men are not employed in a warehouse.

AMANDA: The world is full of young men employed in warehouses and offices and factories.

TOM: Do all of them find adventure in their careers?

AMANDA: They do or they do without it! Not everybody has a craze for adventure.

TOM: Man is by instinct a lover, a hunter, a fighter, and none of those instincts are given much play at the warehouse!

AMANDA: Man is by instinct! Don't quote instinct to me! Instinct is something that people have got away from! It belongs to animals! Christian adults don't want it!

TOM: What do Christian adults want, then, Mother?

AMANDA: Superior things! Things of the mind and the spirit! Only animals have to satisfy instincts! Surely your aims are somewhat higher than theirs! Than monkeys—pigs—

TOM: I reckon they're not.

AMANDA: You're joking. However, that isn't what I wanted to discuss.

TOM: [Rising] I haven't much time.

AMANDA: [Pushing his shoulders] Sit down.

TOM: You want me to punch in red at the ware-house, Mother?

AMANDA: You have five minutes. I want to talk about Laura.

[LEGEND: "PLANS AND PROVISIONS"] TOM: All right! What about Laura?

AMANDA: We have to be making some plans and provisions for her. She's older than you, two years, and nothing has happened. She just drifts along doing nothing. It frightens me terribly how she just drifts along.

TOM: I guess she's the type that people call home girls.

AMANDA: There's no such type, and if there is, it's a pity! That is unless the home is hers, with a husband!

TOM: What?

AMANDA: Oh, I can see the handwriting on the wall as plain as I see the nose in front of my face! It's terrifying! More and more you remind me of your father! He was out all hours without explanation!—Then left! Good-bye! And me with the bag to hold. I saw that letter you got from the Merchant Marine. I know what you're dreaming of. I'm not standing here blindfolded. Very well, then. Then do it! But not till there's somebody to take your place.

TOM: What do you mean?

AMANDA: I mean that as soon as Laura has got somebody to take care of her, married, a home of her own, independent—why, then you'll be free to go wherever you please, on land, on sea, whichever way the wind blows you! But until that time you've got to look out for your sister. I don't say me because I'm old and don't matter! I say for your sister because she's young and dependent. I put her in business college—a dismal failure! Frightened her so it made her sick at the stomach. I took her over to the Young People's League at the church. Another fiasco. She spoke to nobody, nobody spoke to her. Now all she does is fool with those pieces of glass and play those worn-out records. What kind of a life is that for a girl to lead?

TOM: What can I do about it?

AMANDA: Overcome selfishness! Self, self, self is all that you ever think of! [Tom springs up and crosses to get his coat. It is ugly and bulky. He pulls on a cap with earmuffs] Where is your muffler? Put your wool muffler on! [He snatches it angrily from the closet and tosses it around his neck and pulls both ends tight] Tom! I haven't said what I had in mind to ask you,

TOM: I'm too late to-

AMANDA: [Catching his arm—very importunately. Then shyly] Down at the warehouse, aren't there some—nice young men?

TOM: No!

AMANDA: There must be-some . . .

TOM: Mother-[Gesture]

AMANDA: Find out one that's clean-living—doesn't drink and—ask him out for sister!

TOM: What?

AMANDA: For sister! To meet! Get acquainted!

TOM: [Stamping to door] Oh, my go-osh!

AMANDA: Will you? [He opens door. Imploringly] Will you? [He starts down] Will you? Will you, dear?

TOM: [Calling back] YES!

[Amanda closes the door hesitantly and with a troubled but faintly hopeful expression]
[SCREEN IMAGE: GLAMOR MAGAZINE COVER]

[Spot Amanda at phone]

AMANDA: Ella Cartwright? This is Amanda Wingfield! How are you, honey? How is that kidney condition? [Count five] Horrors! [Count five] You're a Christian martyr, yes, honey, that's what you are, a Christian martyr! Well, I just now happened to notice in my little red book that your subscription to the Companion has just run out! I knew that you wouldn't want to miss out on the wonderful serial starting in this new issue. It's by Bessie Mae Hopper, the first thing she's written since Honeymoon for Three. Wasn't that a strange and interesting story? Well, this one is even lovelier, I believe. It has a sophisticated, society background. It's all about the horsey set on Long Island!

FADE OUT

SCENE V.

LEGEND ON SCREEN: "ANNUNCIATION." Fade with music.

It is early dusk of a spring evening. Supper has just been finished in the Wingfield apartment. Amanda and Laura in light-colored dresses are removing dishes from the table, in the upstage area, which is shadowy, their movements formalized almost as a dance or ritual, their moving forms as pale and silent as moths. Tom, in white shirt and trousers, rises from the table and crosses toward the fire-escape.

AMANDA: [As he passes her] Son, will you do me a favor?

TOM: What?

AMANDA: Comb your hair! You look so pretty when your hair is combed! [Tom slouches on sofa with evening paper. Enormous caption "Franco Triumphs"] There is only one respect in which I would like you to emulate your father.

TOM: What respect is that?

AMANDA: The care he always took of his appearance. He never allowed himself to look untidy. [He throws down the paper and crosses to fire-escape] Where are you going?

TOM: I'm going out to smoke.

AMANDA: You smoke too much. A pack a day at fifteen cents a pack. How much would that amount to in a month? Thirty times fifteen is how much, Tom? Figure it out and you will be astounded at what you could save. Enough to give you a night-school course in accounting at Washington U! Just think what a wonderful thing that would be for you, Son!

[Tom is unmoved by the thought]

TOM: I'd rather smoke. [He steps out on landing, letting the screen door slam]

AMANDA: [Sharply] I know! That's the tragedy of it. . . . [Alone, she turns to look at her husband's picture\

DANCE MUSIC: "ALL THE WORLD IS WAITING FOR THE SUNRISE!"]

TOM: [To the audience] Across the alley from us was the Paradise Dance Hall. On evenings in spring the windows and doors were open and the music came outdoors. Sometimes the lights were turned out except for a large glass sphere that hung from the ceiling. It would turn slowly about and filter the dusk with delicate rainbow colors. Then the orchestra played a waltz or a tango, something that had a slow and sensuous rhythm. Couples would come outside, to the relative privacy of the alley. You could see them kissing behind ash-pits and telephone poles. This was the compensation for lives that passed like mine, without any change or adventure. Adventure and change were imminent in this year. They were waiting around the corner for all these kids. Suspended in the mist over Berchtesgaden, caught in the folds of Chamberlain's umbrella—In Spain there was Guernica! But here there was only hot swing music and liquor, dance halls, bars, and movies, and sex that hung in the gloom like a chandelier and flooded the world with brief, deceptive rainbows. . . . All the world was waiting for bombardments!

[Amanda turns from the picture and comes out-

AMANDA: [Sighing] A fire-escape landing's a poor excuse for a porch. [She spreads a newspaper on a step and sits down, gracefully and demurely as if she were settling into a swing on a Mississippi veranda] What are you looking at?

TOM: The moon.

AMANDA: Is there a moon this evening?

том: It's rising over Garfinkel's Delicatessen.

AMANDA: So it is! A little silver slipper of a moon. Have you made a wish on it yet?

том: Um-hum.

AMANDA: What did you wish for?

TOM: That's a secret.

AMANDA: A secret, huh? Well, I won't tell mine either. I will be just as mysterious as you.

TOM: I bet I can guess what yours is. AMANDA: Is my head so transparent?

TOM: You're not a sphinx.

AMANDA: No, I don't have secrets. I'll tell you what I wished for on the moon. Success and happiness for my precious children! I wish for that whenever there's a moon, and when there isn't a moon, I wish for it, too.

TOM: I thought perhaps you wished for a gentleman caller.

AMANDA: Why do you say that?

том: Don't you remember asking me to fetch

AMANDA: I remember suggesting that it would be nice for your sister if you brought home some nice young man from the warehouse. I think that I've made that suggestion more than once.

TOM: Yes, you have made it repeatedly.

AMANDA: Well?

TOM: We are going to have one.

AMANDA: What?

TOM: A gentleman caller!

[THE ANNUNCIATION IS CELEBRATED WITH MUSIC

[Amanda rises]

[IMAGE ON SCREEN: CALLER WITH BOUQUET] AMANDA: You mean you have asked some nice young man to come over?

том: Yep. I've asked him to dinner.

AMANDA: You really did?

том: I did!

AMANDA: You did, and did he-accept?

том: He did!

AMANDA: Well, well—well, well! That's—lovely! TOM: I thought that you would be pleased.

AMANDA: It's definite, then?

том: Very definite. AMANDA: Soon? том: Very soon.

AMANDA: For heaven's sake, stop putting on and tell me some things, will you?

TOM: What things do you want me to tell you? AMANDA: Naturally I would like to know when he's coming!

том: He's coming tomorrow.

AMANDA: Tomorrow? том: Yep. Tomorrow. AMANDA: But, Tom! TOM: Yes, Mother?

AMANDA: Tomorrow gives me no time!

том: Time for what?

AMANDA: Preparations! Why didn't you phone me at once, as soon as you asked him, the minute that he accepted? Then, don't you see, I could have been getting ready!

TOM: You don't have to make any fuss.

AMANDA: Oh, Tom, Tom, of course I have to make a fuss! I want things nice, not sloppy! Not thrown together. I'll certainly have to do some fast thinking, won't I?

TOM: I don't see why you have to think at all.

AMANDA: You just don't know. We can't have a gentleman caller in a pig-sty. All my wedding silver has to be polished, the monogrammed table linen ought to be laundered! The windows have to be washed and fresh curtains put up. And how about clothes? We have to wear something, don't we?

TOM: Mother, this boy is no one to make a fuss over!

AMANDA: Do you realize he's the first young man

we've introduced to your sister? It's terrible, dreadful, disgraceful that poor little sister has never received a single gentleman caller! Tom, come inside! [She opens the screen door]

TOM: What for?

AMANDA: I want to ask you some things.

TOM: If you're going to make such a fuss, I'll call it off, I'll tell him not to come!

AMANDA: You certainly won't do anything of the kind. Nothing offends people worse than broken engagements. It simply means I'll have to work like a Turk! We won't be brilliant, but we will pass inspection. Come on inside. [Tom follows, groaning] Sit down.

TOM: Any particular place you would like me to sit?

AMANDA: Thank heavens I've got that new sofa! I'm also making payments on a floor lamp I'll have sent out! And put the chintz covers on, they'll brighten things up! Of course I'd hoped to have these walls re-papered. . . . What is the young man's name?

TOM: His name is O'Connor.

AMANDA: That, of course, means fish—tomorrow is Friday! I'll have that salmon loaf—with Durkee's dressing! What does he do? He works at the warehouse?

TOM: Of course! How else would I—AMANDA: Tom, he—doesn't drink?

TOM: Why do you ask me that?

AMANDA: Your father did!

TOM: Don't get started on that!

AMANDA: He does drink, then?

TOM: Not that I know of!

AMANDA: Make sure, be certain! The last thing I want for my daughter's a boy who drinks!

TOM: Aren't you being a little bit premature? Mr. O'Connor has not yet appeared on the scene!

AMANDA: But will tomorrow. To meet your sister, and what do I know about his character? Nothing! Old maids are better off than wives of drunkards!

TOM: Oh, my God! AMANDA: Be still!

TOM: [Leaning forward to whisper] Lots of fellows meet girls whom they don't marry!

AMANDA: Oh, talk sensibly, Tom—and don't be sarcastic! [She has gotten a hairbrush]

TOM: What are you doing?

AMANDA: I'm brushing that cow-lick down! What is this young man's position at the warehouse?

TOM: [Submitting grimly to the brush and the interrogation] This young man's position is that of a shipping clerk, Mother.

AMANDA: Sounds to me like a fairly responsible job, the sort of a job you would be in if you just had more get-un.

What is his salary? Have you any idea?

TOM: I would judge it to be approximately eighty-five dollars a month.

MAMANDA: Well-not princely, but-

TOM: Twenty more than I make.

AMANDA: Yes, how well I know! But for a family man, eighty-five dollars a month is not much more than you can just get by on. . . .

TOM: Yes, but Mr. O'Connor is not a family man, AMANDA: He might be, mightn't he? Some time in the future?

TOM: I see. Plans and provisions.

AMANDA: You are the only young man that I know of who ignores the fact that the future becomes the present, the present the past, and the past turns into everlasting regret it you don't plan for it!

TOM: I will think that over and see what I can make of it.

AMANDA: Don't be supercilious with your mother! Tell me some more about this—what do you call him?

TOM: James D. O'Connor. The D. is for Delaney, AMANDA: Irish on both sides! Gracious! And doesn't drink?

TOM: Shall I call him up and ask him right this minute?

AMANDA: The only way to find out about those things is to make discreet inquiries at the proper moment. When I was a girl in Blue Mountain and it was suspected that a young man drank, the girl whose attentions he had been receiving, if any girl was, would sometimes speak to the minister of his church, or rather her father would if her father was living, and sort of feel him out on the young man's character. That is the way such things are discreetly handled to keep a young woman from making a tragic mistake!

TOM: Then how did you happen to make a tragic mistake?

AMANDA: That innocent look of your father's had everyone fooled! He smiled—the world was enchanted! No girl can do worse than put herself at the mercy of a handsome appearance! I hope that Mr. O'Connor is not too good-looking.

TOM: No, he's not too good-looking. He's covered with freckles and hasn't too much of a nose.

AMANDA: He's not right-down homely, though?
TOM: Not right-down homely. Just medium homely, I'd say.

AMANDA: Character's what to look for in a man.

TOM: That's what I've always said, Mother.

AMANDA: You've never said anything of the kind and I suspect you would never give it a thought. Tom: Don't be so suspicious of me.

AMANDA: At least I hope he's the type that's up and coming.

TOM: I think he really goes in for self-improvement.

AMANDA: What reason have you to think so? TOM: He goes to night school.

AMANDA: [Beaming] Splendid! What does he do, I mean study?

TOM: Radio engineering and public speaking!

AMANDA: Then he has visions of being advanced in the world! Any young man who studies public speaking is aiming to have an executive job some day! And radio engineering? A thing for the future! Both of these facts are very illuminating. Those are the sort of things that a mother should know concerning any young man who comes to call on her daughter. Seriously or—not.

TOM: One little warning. He doesn't know about Laura. I didn't let on that we had dark ulterior motives. I just said, why don't you come and have dinner with us? He said okay and that was the whole conversation.

AMANDA: I bet it was! You're eloquent as an oyster. However, he'll know about Laura when he gets here. When he sees how lovely and sweet and pretty she is, he'll thank his lucky stars he was asked to dinner.

TOM: Mother, you mustn't expect too much of Laura.

AMANDA: What do you mean?

TOM: Laura seems all those things to you and me because she's ours and we love her. We don't even notice she's crippled any more.

AMANDA: Don't say crippled. You know that I never allow that word to be used!

TOM: But face facts, Mother. She is and—that's AMANDA: What do you mean "not all"?

TOM: Laura is very different from other girls.

AMANDA: I think the difference is all to her advantage.

TOM: Not quite all—in the eyes of others—strangers—she's terribly shy and lives in a world of her own and those things make her seem a little peculiar to people outside the house.

AMANDA: Don't say peculiar.
TOM: Face the facts. She is.

[THE DANCE-HALL MUSIC CHANGES TO A TANGO THAT HAS A MINOR AND SOMEWHAT OMINOUS TONE]

AMANDA: In what way is she peculiar—may I ask? TOM: [Gently] She lives in a world of her own—a world of—little glass ornaments, Mother. . . . [Gets up. Amanda remains holding brush, looking at him, troubled] She plays old phonograph records and—that's about all— [He glances at himself in the mirror and crosses to door]

AMANDA: [Sharply] Where are you going?

TOM: I'm going to the movies. [Out screen door] AMANDA: Not to the movies, every night to the movies! [Follows quickly to screen door] I don't believe you always go to the movies! [He is gone. Amanda looks worriedly after him for a moment. Then vitality and optimism return and she turns from the door. Crossing to portieres] Laura! Laura! [Laura answers from kitchenette]

LAURA: Yes, Mother.

AMANDA: Let those dishes go and come in front! [Laura appears with dish towel. Gaily] Laura, come here and make a wish on the moon!

[SCREEN IMAGE: MOON]
LAURA: [Entering] Moon—moon?

AMANDA: A little silver slipper of a moon. Look over your left shoulder, Laura, and make a wish! [Laura looks faintly puzzled as if called out of sleep. Amanda seizes her shoulders and turns her at an angle by the door] Now! Now, darling, wish!

LAURA: What shall I wish for, Mother?

AMANDA: [Her voice trembling and her eyes suddenly filling with tears] Happiness, Good fortune! [The violin rises and the stage dims out]

CURTAIN

SCENE VI.

[IMAGE: HIGH SCHOOL HERO]

And so the following evening I brought Jim home to dinner. I had known Jim slightly in high school. In high school Jim was a hero. He had tremendous Irish good nature and vitality with the scrubbed and polished look of white chinaware. He seemed to move in a continual spotlight. He was a star in basketball, captain of the debating club, president of the senior class and the glee club and he sang the male lead in the annual light operas. He was always running or bounding, never just walking. He seemed always at the point of defeating the law of gravity. He was shooting with such velocity through his adolescence that you would logically expect him to arrive at nothing short of the White House by the time he was thirty. But Jim apparently ran into more interference after his graduation from Soldan. His speed had definitely slowed. Six years after he left high school he was holding a job that wasn't much better than mine.

[IMAGE: CLERK]

He was the only one at the warehouse with whom I was on friendly terms. I was valuable to him as someone who could remember his former glory, who had seen him win basketball games and the silver cup in debating. He knew of my secret practice of retiring to a cabinet of the wash-room to work on poems when business was slack in the warehouse. He called me Shakespeare. And while the other boys in the warehouse regarded me with suspicious hostility, Jim took a humorous attitude toward me. Gradually his attitude affected the others, their hostility wore off and they also began to smile at me as people smile at an oddly fashioned dog who trots across their path as some distance.

I knew that Jim and Laura had known each other at Soldan, and I had heard Laura speak admiringly of his voice. I didn't know if Jim remembered her or not. In high school Laura had been as unobtrusive as Jim had been astonishing. If he did remember Laura, it was not as my sister, for when I asked him to dinner, he grinned and said, "You know, Shakespeare, I never thought of you as having folks!"

He was about to discover that I did. . . .

[Light up stage]

[LEGEND ON SCREEN: "THE ACCENT OF A COM-ING FOOT"]

[Friday evening. It is about five o'clock of a late spring evening which comes "scattering poems in the sky." A delicate lemony light is in the Wingfield apartment. Amanda has worked like a Turk in preparation for the gentleman caller. The results are astonishing. The new floor lamp with its rose-silk shade is in place, a colored paper lantern conceals the broken light-fixture in the ceiling, new billowing white curtains are at the windows, chintz covers are on chairs and sofa, a pair of new sofa pillows make their initial appearance. Open boxes and tissue paper are scattered on the floor, Laura stands in the middle with lifted arms while Amanda crouches before her, adjusting the hem of the new dress, devout and ritualistic. The dress is colored and designed by memory. The arrangement of Laura's hair is changed; it is softer and more becoming. A fragile, unearthly prettiness has come out in Laura: she is like a piece of translucent glass touched by light, given a momentary radiance, not actual, not lasting]

AMANDA: [Impatiently] Why are you trembling? LAURA: Mother, you've made me so nervous! AMANDA: How have I made you nervous?

LAURA: By all this fuss! You make it seem so important!

AMANDA: I don't understand you, Laura. You couldn't be satisfied with just sitting home, and yet whenever I try to arrange something for you, you seem to resist it. [She gets up] Now take a look at yourself. No, wait! Wait just a moment—I have an idea!

LAURA: What is it now?

[Amanda produces two powder puffs which she wraps in handkerchiefs and stuffs in Laura's bosom]

LAURA: Mother, what are you doing?

AMANDA: They call them "Gay Deceivers"!

LAURA: I won't wear them! AMANDA: You will! LAURA: Why should I?

AMANDA: Because, to be painfully honest, your chest is flat.

LAURA: You make it seem like we were setting a trap.

AMANDA: All pretty girls are a trap, a pretty trap, and men expect them to be. [LEGEND: "A PRETTY TRAP"] Now look at yourself, young lady. This is the prettiest you will ever be! I've got to fix myself now! You're going to be surprised by your mother's appearance! [She crosses through portieres, humming gaily. Laura moves slowly to the long mirror and stares solemnly at herself. A wind blows the white curtains inward in a slow, graceful motion and with a faint, sorrowful sighing]

AMANDA: [Off stage] It isn't dark enough yet. [She turns slowly before the mirror with a troubled look]
[LEGEND ON SCREEN: "THIS IS MY SISTER: CELEBRATE HER WITH STRINGS!" MUSIC]

AMANDA: [Laughing, off] I'm going to show you something. I'm going to make a spectacular appearance!

LAURA: What is it, Mother?

AMANDA: Possess your soul in patience—you will see! Something I've resurrected from that old trunk! Styles haven't changed so terribly much after all. . . . [She parts the portieres] Now just look at your mother! [She wears a girlish frock of yellowed voile with a blue silk sash. She carries a bunch of jonquils—the legend of her youth is nearly revived. Feverishly] This is the dress in which I led the cotillion. Won the cakewalk twice at Sunset Hill, wore one spring to the Governor's ball in Jackson! See how I sashaved around the ballroom, Laura? [She raises her skirt and does a mincing step around the room] I wore it on Sundays for my gentlemen callers! I had it on the day I met your father-I had malaria fever all that spring. The change of climate from East Tennessee to the Delta-weakened resistance—I had a little temperature all the time—not enough to be serious-just enough to make me restless and giddy!—Invitations poured in—parties all over the Delta!-"Stay in bed," said Mother, "you have fever!"-but I just wouldn't.-I took quinine but kept on going, going!—Evenings, dances!— Afternoons, long, long rides! Picnics—lovely!—So lovely, that country in May .-- All lacy with dogwood, literally flooded with jonquils!—That was the spring I had the craze for jonguils. Jonguils became an absolute obsession. Mother said "Honey, there's no more room for jonquils." And still I kept on bringing in more jonquils. Whenever, wherever I saw them, I'd say, "Stop! Stop! I see jonquils!" I made the young men help me gather the jonquils! It was a joke, Amanda and her jonguils! Finally there were no more vases to hold them, every available space was filled with jonguils. No vases to hold them? All right, I'll hold them myself! And then I-[She stops in front of the picture. MUSIC] met your father! Malaria fever and jonguils and thenthis—boy. . . . [She switches on the rose-colored lamp] I hope they get here before it starts to rain. [She crosses upstage and places the jonquils in bowl on table] I gave your brother a little extra change so he and Mr. O'Connor could take the service car

LAURA: [With altered look] What did you say his name was?

AMANDA: O'Connor.

LAURA: What is his first name?

AMANDA: I don't remember. Oh, yes, I do. It was —Jim!

[Laura sways slightly and catches hold of a

[LEGEND ON SCREEN: "NOT JIM!"]

LAURA: [Faintly] Not-Jim!

AMANDA: Yes, that was it, it was Jim! I've never known a Jim that wasn't nice!

[MUSIC: OMINOUS]

LAURA: Are you sure his name is Jim O'Connor? AMANDA: Yes. Why?

LAURA: Is he the one that Tom used to know in high school?

AMANDA: He didn't say so. I think he just got to know him at the warehouse.

LAURA: There was a Jim O'Connor we both knew in high school-[Then, with effort] If that is the one that Tom is bringing to dinner—you'll have to excuse me, I won't come to the table.

AMANDA: What sort of nonsense is this?

LAURA: You asked me once if I'd ever liked a boy. Don't you remember I showed you this boy's AMANDA: You mean the boy you showed me in the year book?

LAURA: Yes, that boy.

AMANDA: Laura, Laura, were you in love with that boy?

LAURA: I don't know, Mother. All I know is I couldn't sit at the table if it was him!

AMANDA: It won't be him! It isn't the least bit likely. But whether it is or not, you will come to the table. You will not be excused.

LAURA: I'll have to be, Mother.

AMANDA: I don't intend to humor your silliness, Laura. I've had too much from you and your brother, both! So just sit down and compose yourself till they come. Tom has forgotten his key so you'll have to let them in, when they arrive.

LAURA: [Panicky] Oh, Mother-you answer the AMANDA: [Lightly] I'll be in the kitchen—busy! LAURA: Oh, Mother, please answer the door, don't make me do it!

AMANDA: [Crossing into kitchenette] I've got to fix the dressing for the salmon. Fuss, fuss-silliness!over a gentleman caller!

[Door swings shut. Laura is left alone]

[LEGEND: "TERROR!"]

[She utters a low moan and turns off the lamp sits stiffly on the edge of the sofa, knotting her fingers together]

[LEGEND ON SCREEN: "THE OPENING OF A

[Tom and Jim appear on the fire-escape steps and climb to landing. Hearing their approach, Laura rises with a panicky gesture. She retreats to the portieres. The doorbell. Laura catches her breath and touches her throat. Low drums]

AMANDA: [Calling] Laura, sweetheart! The door! [Laura stares at it without moving]

JIM: I think we just beat the rain.

TOM: Uh-huh. [He rings again, nervously. Jim whistles and fishes for a cigarette]

AMANDA: [Very, very gaily] Laura, that is your brother and Mr. O'Connor! Will you let them in, darling?

[Laura crosses toward kitchenette door]

LAURA: [Breathlessly] Mother—you go to the [Amanda steps out of kitchenette and stares furiously at Laura. She points imperiously at the doorl

LAURA: Please, please!

AMANDA: [In a fierce whisper] What is the matter with you, you silly thing?

LAURA: [Desperately] Please, you answer it, please! AMANDA: I told you I wasn't going to humor you, Laura. Why have you chosen this moment to lose your mind?

LAURA: Please, please, please, you go!

AMANDA: You'll have to go to the door because I

LAURA: [Despairingly] I can't either!

AMANDA: Why? LAURA: I'm sick!

AMANDA: I'm sick, too-of your nonsense! Why can't you and your brother be normal people? Fantastic whims and behavior! [Tom gives a long ring] Preposterous goings on! Can you give me one reason—[Calls out lyrically] Coming! Just one second!-why you should be afraid to open a door? Now you answer it, Laura!

LAURA: Oh, oh, oh . . . [She returns through the portieres. Darts to the victrola and winds it frantically and turns it on]

AMANDA: Laura Wingfield, you march right to that door!

LAURA: Yes-ves. Mother!

[A faraway, scratchy rendition of "Dardanella" softens the air and gives her strength to move through it. She slips to the door and draws it cautiously open. Tom enters with the caller, Jim O'Connor!

TOM: Laura, this is Jim. Jim, this is my sister,

JIM: [Stepping inside] I didn't know that Shakespeare had a sister!

LAURA: [Retreating stiff and trembling from the door] How-how do you do?

JIM: [Heartily extending his hand] Okay! [Laura touches it hesitantly with hers]

JIM: Your hand's cold, Laura!

LAURA: Yes, well-I've been playing the vic-

JIM: Must have been playing classical music on it! You ought to play a little hot swing music to warm you up!

LAURA: Excuse me—I haven't finished playing the victrola. . . . [She turns awkwardly and hurries into the front room. She pauses a second by the victrola. Then catches her breath and darts through the portieres like a frightened deer

JIM: [Grinning] What was the matter?

TOM: Oh-with Laura? Laura is-terribly shy.

JIM: Shy, huh? It's unusual to meet a shy girl nowadays. I don't believe you ever mentioned you had a sister.

TOM: Well, now you know. I have one. Here is the Post Dispatch. You want a piece of it?

JIM: Uh-huh.

том: What piece? The comics?

JIM: Sports! [Glances at it] Ole Dizzy Dean is on his bad behavior.

TOM: [Disinterest] Yeah? [Lights cigarette and crosses back to fire-escape door]

JIM: Where are you going?

TOM: I'm going out on the terrace.

JIM: [Goes after him] You know, Shakespeare—I'm going to sell you a bill of goods!

том: What goods?

JIM: A course I'm taking.

том: Huh?

JIM: In public speaking! You and me, we're not the warehouse type.

TOM: Thanks—that's good news. But what has public speaking got to do with it?

JIM: It fits you for—executive positions!

TOM: Awww.

JIM: I tell you it's done a helluva lot for me.

[IMAGE: EXECUTIVE AT DESK]

TOM: In what respect?

JIM: In every! Ask yourself what is the difference between you an' me and men in the office down front? Brains?—No!—Ability?—No! Then what? Just one little thing—

TOM: What is that one little thing?

JIM: Primarily it amounts to—social poise! Being able to square up to people and hold your own on any social level!

AMANDA: [Off stage] Tom?

TOM: Yes, Mother?

AMANDA: Is that you and Mr. O'Connor?

TOM: Yes, Mother.

AMANDA: Well, you just make yourselves comfortable in there.

TOM: Yes, Mother.

AMANDA: Ask Mr. O'Connor if he would like to wash his hands.

JIM: Aw, no—no—thank you—I took care of that at the warehouse. Tom—

TOM: Yes?

JIM: Mr. Mendoza was speaking to me about you.

том: Favorably?

JIM: What do you think?

TOM: Well-

JIM: You're going to be out of a job if you don't wake up.

TOM: I am waking up— JIM: You show no signs. TOM: The signs are interior.

[IMAGE ON SCREEN: THE SAILING VESSEL WITH JOLLY ROGER AGAIN]

TOM: I'm planning to change. [He leans over the rail speaking with quiet exhilaration. The incandescent marquees and signs of the first-run movie houses light his face from across the alley. He looks like a voyager] I'm right at the point of committing myself to a future that doesn't include the warehouse and Mr. Mendoza or even a night-school course in public speaking.

JIM: What are you gassing about?

TOM: I'm tired of the movies.

JIM: Movies!

TOM: Yes, movies! Look at them-[A wave toward the marvels of Grand Avenue] All of those glamorous people-having adventures-hogging it all, gobbling the whole thing up! You know what happens? People go to the movies instead of moving! Hollywood characters are supposed to have all the adventures for everybody in America, while everybody in America sits in a dark room and watches them have them! Yes, until there's a war. That's when adventure becomes available to the masses! Everyone's dish, not only Gable's! Then the people in the dark room come out of the dark room to have some adventures themselves-Goody, goody! -It's our turn now, to go to the South Sca Island -to make a safari-to be exotic, far-off!-but I'm not patient. I don't want to wait till then. I'm tired of the movies and I am about to move!

JIM: [Incredulously] Move?

TOM: Yes.

JIM: When?

TOM: Soon!

JIM: Where? Where?

[Theme three music seems to answer the question, while Tom thinks it over. He searches among his pockets]

TOM: I'm starting to boil inside. I know I seem dreamy, but inside—well, I'm boiling!—Whenever I pick up a shoe, I shudder a little thinking how short life is and what I am doing!— Whatever that means, I know it doesn't mean shoes—except as something to wear on a traveler's feet! [Finds paper] Look—

JIM: What?

TOM: I'm a member.

JIM: [Reading] The Union of Merchant Seamen. TOM: I paid my dues this month, instead of the light bill.

JIM: You will regret it when they turn the lights off.

том: I won't be here.

JIM: How about your mother?

TOM: I'm like my father. The bastard son of a bastard! See how he grins? And he's been absent going on sixteen years!

JIM: You're just talking, you drip. How does your mother feel about it?

TOM: Shhh!—Here comes Mother! Mother is not acquainted with my plans!

AMANDA: [Enters portieres] Where are you all? TOM: On the terrace, Mother.

[They start inside. She advances to them. Tom is distinctly shocked at her appearance. Even Jim blinks a little. He is making his first contact with girlish Southern vivacity and in spite of the night-school course in public speaking is somewhat thrown off the beam by the unexpected outlay of social charm. Certain responses are attempted by Jim but are swept aside by Amanda's gay laughter and chatter. Tom is embarrassed but after the first shock Jim reacts very warmly. Grins and chuckles, is altogether won over.]

[IMAGE: AMANDA AS A GIRL]

AMANDA: [Coyly smiling, shaking her girlish ring-lets] Well, well, well, so this is Mr. O'Connor. Introductions entirely unnecessary. I've heard so much about you from my boy. I finally said to him, Tom—good gracious!—why don't you bring this paragon to supper? I'd like to meet this nice young man at the warehouse!—Instead of just hearing him sing your praises so much!

I don't know why my son is so stand-offish—that's not Southern behavior!

Let's sit down and—I think we could stand a little more air in here! Tom, leave the door open. I felt a nice fresh breeze a moment ago. Where has it gone to?

Mmm, so warm already! And not quite summer, even. We're going to burn up when summer really gets started.

However, we're having—we're having a very light supper. I think light things are better fo' this time of year. The same as light clothes are. Light clothes an' light food are what warm weather calls fo'. You know our blood gets so thick during th' winter—it takes a while fo' us to adjust ou'selves!—when the season changes . . .

It's come so quick this year. I wasn't prepared. All of a sudden—heavens! Already summer!—I ran to the trunk an' pulled out this light dress— Terribly old! Historical almost! But feels so good—so good an' co-ol, y'know. . . .

TOM: Mother—
AMANDA: Yes, honey?
TOM: How about—supper?

AMANDA: Honey, you go ask Sister if supper is ready! You know that Sister is in full charge of supper!

Tell her you hungry boys are waiting for it. [To Jim] Have you met Laura?

JIM: She-

AMANDA: Let you in? Oh, good, you've met already! It's rare for a girl as sweet an' pretty as Laura to be domestic! But Laura is, thank heavens, not only pretty but also very domestic. I'm not at all. I never was a bit. I never could make a thing but angel-food cake. Well, in the South we had so many servants. Gone, gone, gone. All vestige of gracious living! Gone completely! I wasn't prepared for what the future brought me. All of my gentlemen callers were sons of planters and so of course I assumed that I would be married to one and raise my family on a large piece of land with plenty of servants But man proposes—and woman accepts the proposal!—To vary that old, old saying a little bit— I married no planter! I married a man who worked for the telephone company!—That gallantly smiling gentleman over there! [Points to the picture] A telephone man who—fell in love with long-distance!— Now he travels and I don't even know where!— But what am I going on for about my tribulations? Tell me yours—I hope you don't have any! Tom?

TOM: [Returning] Yes, Mother? AMANDA: Is supper nearly ready?

TOM: It looks to me like supper is on the table.

AMANDA: Let me look— [She rises prettily and looks through portieres] Oh, lovely!—But where is TOM: Laura is not feeling well and she says that she thinks she'd better not come to the table.

AMANDA: What?—Nonsense!—Laura? Oh, Laura! Laura: [Off stage, faintly] Yes, Mother.

AMANDA: You really must come to the table. We won't be seated until you come to the table! Come in, Mr. O'Connor. You sit over there, and I'll—Laura? Laura Wingfield! You're keeping us waiting, honey! We can't say grace until you come to the table!

[The back door is pushed weakly open and Laura comes in. She is obviously quite faint, her lips trembling, her eyes wide and staring. She moves unsteadily toward the table]

[LEGEND: "TERROR!"]

[Outside a summer storm is coming abruptly. The white curtains billow inward at the windows and there is a sorrowful murmur and deep blue dusk. Laura suddenly stumbles—she catches at a chair with a faint moan]

TOM: Laura!
AMANDA: Laura!

[There is a clap of thunder]

[LEGEND: "AH!"]
[Despairingly]

Why, Laura, you are sick, darling! Tom, help your sister into the living room, dear! Sit in the living room, Laura—rest on the sofa. Well! [To the gentleman caller] Standing over the hot stove made her ill!—I told her that it was just too warm this evening, but— [Tom comes back in. Laura is on the sofa] Is Laura all right now?

том: Yes.

AMANDA: What is that? Rain? A nice cool rain has come up! [She gives the gentleman caller a fright-ened look] I think we may—have grace—now...
[Tom looks at her stupidly] Tom, honey—you say grace!

TOM: Oh . . . "For these and all thy mercies—"
[They bow their heads, Amanda stealing a nervous glance at Jim. In the living room Laura, stretched on the sofa, clenches her hand to her lips, to hold back a shuddering sob] God's Holy Name be praised—

THE SCENE DIMS OUT

SCENE VII

A Souvenir.

Half an hour later. Dinner is just being finished in the upstage area which is concealed by the drawn portieres. As the curtain rises Laura is still huddled upon the sofa, her feet drawn under her, her head resting on a pale blue pillow, her eyes wide and mysteriously watchful. The new floor lamp with its shade of rose-colored silk gives a soft, becoming light to her face, bringing out the fragile, unearthly prettiness which usually escapes attention. There is a steady murmur of rain, but it is slackening and stops soon after the scene begins; the air outside becomes pale and luminous as the moon breaks out. A moment after the curtain rises, the lights in both rooms flicker and go out.

JIM: Hey, there, Mr. Light Bulb! [Amanda laughs nervously]

[LEGEND: "SUSPENSION OF A PUBLIC SERVICE"]

AMANDA: Where was Moses when the lights went out? Ha-ha. Do you know the answer to that one,
Mr. O'Connor?

JIM: No, Ma'am, what's the answer?

AMANDA: In the dark! [Jim laughs appreciatively] Everybody sit still. I'll light the candles. Isn't it lucky we have them on the table? Where's a match? Which of you gentlemen can provide a match?

JIM: Here.

AMANDA: Thank you, sir. JIM: Not at all, Ma'am!

AMANDA: I guess the fuse has burnt out. Mr. O'Connor, can you tell a burnt-out fuse? I know I can't and Tom is a total loss when it comes to mechanics.

[Sound: Getting up: Voices recede a little to kitchenette]

Oh, be careful you don't bump into something. We don't want our gentleman caller to break his neck. Now wouldn't that be a fine howdy-do?

JIM: Ha-ha! Where is the fuse-box?

AMANDA: Right here next to the stove. Can you see anything?

JIM: Just a minute.

AMANDA: Isn't electricity a mysterious thing? Wasn't it Benjamin Franklin who tied a key to a kite? We live in such a mysterious universe, don't we? Some people say that science clears up all the mysteries for us. In my opinion it only creates more!

Have you found it yet?

JIM: No, Ma'am. All these fuses look okay to me.

AMANDA: Tom! Tom: Yes, Mother?

AMANDA: That light bill I gave you several days ago. The one I told you we got the notices about? [LEGEND: "HA!"] том: Oh.—Yeah.

AMANDA: You didn't neglect to pay it by any chance?

том: Why, I—

AMANDA: Didn't! I might have known it!

JIM: Shakespeare probably wrote a poem on that light bill, Mrs. Wingfield.

AMANDA: I might have known better than to trust him with it! There's such a high price for negligence in this world!

JIM: Maybe the poem will win a ten-dollar prize.

AMANDA: We'll just have to spend the remainder of the evening in the nineteenth century, before Mr.

Edison made the Mazda lamp!

JIM: Candlelight is my favorite kind of light.

AMANDA: That shows you're romantic! But that's no excuse for Tom. Well, we got through dinner. Very considerate of them to let us get through dinner before they plunged us into everlasting darkness, wasn't it, Mr. O'Connor?

JIM: Ha-ha!

AMANDA: Tom, as a penalty for your carelessness you can help me with the dishes.

JIM: Let me give you a hand. AMANDA: Indeed you will not!

JIM: I ought to be good for something.

AMANDA: Good for something? [Her tone is rhap-sodic] You? Why, Mr. O'Connor, nobody, nobody's given me this much entertainment in years—as you have!

JIM: Aw, now, Mrs. Wingfield!

AMANDA: I'm not exaggerating, not one bit! But Sister is all by her lonesome. You go keep her company in the parlor!

I'll give you this lovely old candelabrum that used to be on the altar at the church of the Heavenly Rest. It was melted a little out of shape when the church burnt down. Lightning struck it one spring. Gypsy Jones was holding a revival at the time and he intimated that the church was destroyed because the Episcopalians gave card parties.

JIM: На-ha.

AMANDA: And how about you coaxing Sister to drink a little wine? I think it would be good for her! Can you carry both at once?

JIM: Sure. I'm Superman!

AMANDA: Now, Thomas, get into this aproni
[The door of the kitchenette swings closed on Amanda's gay laughter; the flickering light approaches the portieres. Laura sits up nervously as he enters. Her speech at first is low and breathless from the almost intolerable strain of being alone with a stranger

[THE LEGEND: "I DON'T SUPPOSE YOU REMEMBER ME AT ALL!"]

[In her first speeches in this scene, before Jim's warmth overcomes her paralyzing shyness, Laura's voice is thin and breathless as though she has just run up a steep flight of stairs. Jim's attitude is gently humorous. In playing this scene it should be stressed that while the incident is apparently unimportant, it is to Laura the climax of her secret life]

JIM: Hello, there, Laura.

LAURA: [Faintly] Hello. [She clears her throat] JIM: How are you feeling now? Better?

LAURA: Yes. Yes, thank you.

JIM: This is for you. A little dandelion wine. [He extends it toward her with extravagant gallantry]

LAURA: Thank you.

JIM: Drink it—but don't get drunk! [He laughs heartily. Laura takes the glass uncertainly; laughs shyly] Where shall I set the candles?

LAURA: Oh—oh, anywhere . . .

JIM: How about here on the floor? Any objections?

LAURA: No.

JIM: I'll spread a newspaper under to catch the drippings. I like to sit on the floor. Mind if I do?

LAURA: Oh, no.

JIM: Give me a pillow?

LAURA: What? JIM: A pillow!

LAURA: Oh . . . [Hands him one quickly]

JIM: How about you? Don't you like to sit on the floor?

LAURA: Oh-yes.

JIM: Why don't you then?

LAURA: I-will.

JIM: Take a pillow! [Laura does. Sits on the other side of the candelabrum. Jim crosses his legs and smiles engagingly at her] I can't hardly see you sitting way over there.

LAURA: I can—see you.

JIM: I know, but that's not fair, I'm in the limelight. [Laura moves her pillow closer] Good! Now I can see you! Comfortable?

LAURA: Yes.

JIM: So am I. Comfortable as a cow! Will you have some gum?

LAURA: No, thank you.

JIM: I think that I will indulge, with your permission. [Musingly unwraps it and holds it up] Think of the fortune made by the guy that invented the first piece of chewing gum. Amazing, huh? The Wrigley Building is one of the sights of Chicago.—I saw it summer before last when I went up to the Century of Progress. Did you take in the Century of Progress?

LAURA: No, I didn't.

JIM: Well, it was quite a wonderful exposition.

What impressed me most was the Hall of Science. Gives you an idea of what the future will be in America, even more wonderful than the present time is! [Pause. Smiling at her] Your brother tells me you're shy. Is that right, Laura?

LAURA: I-don't know.

JIM: I judge you to be an old-fashioned type of girl. Well, I think that's a pretty good type to be. Hope you don't think I'm being too personal—do you?

LAURA: [Hastily, out of embarrassment] I believe I will take a piece of gum, if you—don't mind. [Clearing her throat] Mr. O'Connor, have you—kept up with your singing?

JIM: Singing? Me?

LAURA: Yes. I remember what a beautiful voice you had.

JIM: When did you hear me sing?
[VOICE OFF STAGE IN THE PAUSE]

VOICE: [Off stage]

O blow, ye winds, heigh-ho, A-roving I will go!
I'm off to my love
With a boxing glove—
Ten thousand miles away!

JIM: You say you've heard me sing?

LAURA: Oh, yes! Yes, very often . . . I—don't suppose—you remember me—at all?

JIM: [Smiling doubtfully] You know I have an idea I've seen you before. I had that idea as soon as you opened the door. It seemed almost like I was about to remember your name. But the name I started to call you—wasn't a name! And so I stopped myself before I said it.

LAURA: Wasn't it—Blue Roses?

JIM: [Springs up. Grinning] Blue Roses!—My gosh, yes—Blue Roses! That's what I had on my tongue when you opened the door! Isn't it funny what tricks your memory plays? I didn't connect you with high school somehow or other. But that's where it was; it was high school. I didn't even know you were Shakespeare's sister! Gosh, I'm sorry.

LAURA: I didn't expect you to. You—barely knew me!

JIM: But we did have a speaking acquaintance, huh?

LAURA: Yes, we-spoke to each other.

JIM: When did you recognize me?

LAURA: Oh, right away!

JIM: Soon as I came in the door?

LAURA: When I heard your name I thought it was probably you. I knew that Tom used to know you a little in high school. So when you came in the door—Well, then I was—sure.

JIM: Why didn't you say something, then?

LAURA: [Breathlessly] I didn't know what to say, I was—too surprised!

JIM: For goodness' sakes! You know, this sure is funny!

LAURA: Yes! Yes, isn't it, though . . .

JIM: Didn't we have a class in something together?

LAURA: Yes, we did.

JIM: What class was that?

LAURA: It was—singing—Chorus!

JIM: Aw!

LAURA: I sat across the aisle from you in the Aud.

JIM: Aw

LAURA: Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays.

JIM: Now I remember—you always came in late. LAURA: Yes, it was so hard for me, getting upstairs. I had that brace on my leg—it clumped so loud!

JIM: I never heard any clumping.

LAURA: [Wincing at the recollection] To me it sounded like—thunder!

JIM: Well, well, I never even noticed.

LAURA: And everybody was seated before I came in. I had to walk in front of all those people. My seat was in the back row. I had to go clumping all the way up the aisle with everyone watching!

JIM: You shouldn't have been self-conscious.

LAURA: I know, but I was. It was always such a relief when the singing started.

JIM: Aw, yes, I've placed you now! I used to call you Blue Roses. How was it that I got started calling you that?

LAURA: I was out of school a little while with pleurosis. When I came back you asked me what was the matter. I said I had pleurosis—you thought I said Blue Roses. That's what you always called me after that!

JIM: I hope you didn't mind.

LAURA: Oh, no—I liked it. You see, I wasn't acquainted with many—people. . . .

JIM: As I remember you sort of stuck by your-self.

LAURA: I—I—never have had much luck at-

JIM: I don't see why you wouldn't. LAURA: Well, I—started out badly.

JIM: You mean being-

LAURA: Yes, it sort of—stood between me—

JIM: You shouldn't have let it! LAURA: I know, but it did, and— JIM: You were shy with people!

LAURA: I tried not to be but never could-

JIM: Overcome it?

LAURA: No, I-I never could!

JIM: I guess being shy is something you have to work out of kind of gradually.

LAURA: [Sorrowfully] Yes—I guess it—

JIM: Takes time! LAURA: Yes-

JIM: People are not so dreadful when you know them. That's what you have to remember! And everybody has problems, not just you, but practically everybody has got some problems. You think of yourself as having the only problems, as being the only one who is disappointed. But just look around you and you will see lots of people as disappointed as you are. For instance, I hoped when I was going to high school that I would be further along at this time, six years later, than I am now— You remember that wonderful write-up I had in The Torch?

LAURA: Yes! [She rises and crosses to table]

JIM: It said I was bound to succeed in anything I went into! [Laura returns with the annual] Holy Jeez! The Torch! [He accepts it reverently. They smile across it with mutual wonder. Laura crouches beside him and they begin to turn through it. Laura's shyness is dissolving in his warmth]

LAURA: Here you are in The Pirates of Penzance! JIM: [Wistfully] I sang the baritone lead in that operetta.

LAURA: [Raptly] So-beautifully!

JIM: [Protesting] Aw-

LAURA: Yes, yes-beautifully-beautifully!

JIM: You heard me? LAURA: All three times!

JIM: No! LAURA: Yes!

JIM: All three performances?

LAURA: [Looking down] Yes.

JIM: Why?

LAURA: I-wanted to ask you to-autograph my program.

JIM: Why didn't you ask me to?

LAURA: You were always surrounded by your own friends so much that I never had a chance to.

JIM: You should have just-

LAURA: Well, I—thought you might think I was— JIM: Thought I might think you was—what?

LAURA: Oh-

JIM: [With reflective relish] I was beleaguered by females in those days.

LAURA: You were terribly popular!

ли: Yeah-

LAURA: You had such a—friendly way—

JIM: I was spoiled in high school. LAURA: Everybody—liked you!

JIM: Including you?

LAURA: I—yes, I—I did, too— [She gently closes the book in her lap]

JIM: Well, well!—Give me that program, Laura. [She hands it to him. He signs it with a flourish] There you are—better late than never!

LAURA: Oh, I-what a-surprise!

JIM: My signature isn't worth very much right now. But some day—maybe—it will increase in value! Being disappointed is one thing and being discouraged is something else. I am disappointed but I am not discouraged. I'm twenty-three years old. How old are you?

LAURA: I'll be twenty-four in June.

JIM: That's not old age!

LAURA: No. but-

JIM: You finished high school?

LAURA: [With difficulty] I didn't go back.
JIM: You mean you dropped out?

LAURA: I made bad grades in my final examinations. [She rises and replaces the book and the program. Her voice strained] How is—Emily Meisenbach getting along?

JIM: Oh, that kraut-head!

LAURA: Why do you call her that?

JIM: That's what she was.

LAURA: You're not still-going with her?

JIM: I never see her.

LAURA: It said in the Personal Section that you were—engaged!

JIM: I know, but I wasn't impressed by that-propaganda!

LAURA: It wasn't-the truth?

JIM: Only in Emily's optimistic opinion!

LAURA: Oh-

[LEGEND: "WHAT HAVE YOU DONE SINCE HIGH SCHOOL?"]

[Jim lights a cigarette and leans indolently back on his elbows smiling at Laura with a warmth and charm which lights her inwardly with altar candles. She remains by the table and turns in her hands a piece of glass to cover her tumult]

JIM: [After several reflective puffs on a cigarette] What have you done since high school? [She seems not to hear him] Huh? [Laura looks up] I said what have you done since high school, Laura?

LAURA: Nothing much.

JIM: You must have been doing something these six long years.

LAURA: Yes.

JIM: Well, then, such as what?

LAURA: I took a business course at business college—

JIM: How did that work out?

LAURA: Well, not very—well—I had to drop out, it gave me—indigestion—

[Jim laughs gently]

JIM: What are you doing now?

LAURA: I don't do anything—much. Oh, please don't think I sit around doing nothing! My glass collection takes up a good deal of time. Glass is something you have to take good care of.

JIM: What did you say—about glass?

LAURA: Collection I said—I have one— [She clears her throat and turns away again, acutely shy]

JIM: [Abruptly] You know what I judge to be the trouble with you? Inferiority complex! Know what that is? That's what they call it when someone low-rates himself! I understand it because I had it, too. Although my case was not so aggravated as yours seems to be. I had it until I took up public speaking, developed my voice, and learned that I had an aptitude for science. Before that time I never thought of myself as being outstanding in any way whatsoever! Now I've never made a regular study of it, but I have a friend who says I can analyze people better than doctors that make a profession of it. I don't claim that to be necessarily true, but I can sure guess a person's psychology, Laura! [Takes out] his gum] Excuse me, Laura. I always take it out when the flavor is gone. I'll use this scrap of paper to wrap it in. I know how it is to get it stuck on a shoe. Yep—that's what I judge to be your principal trouble. A lack of confidence in yourself as a person. You don't have the proper amount of faith in yourself. I'm basing that fact on a number of your remarks and also on certain observations I've made. For instance that clumping you thought was so awful in high school. You say you even dreaded to walk into class. You see what you did? You dropped out of school, you gave up an education because of a clump, which as far as I know was practically non-existent! A little physical defect is what you have. Hardly noticeable even! Magnified thousands of times by imagination! You know what my strong advice to you is? Think of yourself as superior in some way!

LAURA: In what way would I think?

JIM: Why, man alive, Laura! Just look about you a little. What do you see? A world full of common people! All of 'em born and all of 'em going to die! Which of them has one-tenth of your good points! Or mine! Or anyone else's, as far as that goes—Gosh! Everybody excels in some one thing. Some in many! [Unconsciously glances at himself in the mirror] All you've got to do is discover in what! Take me, for instance. [He adjusts his tie at the mirror] My interest happens to lie in electro-dynamics. I'm taking a course in radio engineering at night school, Laura, on top of a fairly responsible job at the warehouse. I'm taking that course and studying public speaking.

LAURA: Ohhhh.

JIM: Because I believe in the future of television! [Turning back to her] I wish to be ready to go up right along with it. Therefore I'm planning to get in on the ground floor. In fact I've already made the right connections and all that remains is for the industry to get under way! Full steam— [His eyes are starry] Knowledge—Zzzzzp! Money—Zzzzzzp!—Power! That's the cycle democracy is built on! [His attitude is convincingly dynamic. Laura stares at him, even her shyness eclipsed in her absolute wonder. He suddenly grins] I guess you think I think a lot of myself!

LAURA: No---o-o, I---

JIM: Now how about you? Isn't there something you take more interest in than anything else?

LAURA: Well, I do—as I said—have my—glass collection—

[A peal of girlish laughter from the kitchen]
JIM: I'm not right sure I know what you're talking about. What kind of glass is it?

LAURA: Little articles of it, they're ornaments mostly! Most of them are little animals made out of glass, the tiniest little animals in the world. Mother calls them a glass menagerie! Here's an example of one, if you'd like to see it! This is one of the oldest. It's nearly thirteen.

[Music: "The Glass Menagerie"]
[He stretches out his hand]

Oh, be careful—if you breathe, it breaks!

JIM: I'd better not take it. I'm pretty clumsy with things.

LAURA: Go on, I trust you with him! [Places it in his palm] There now—you're holding him gently! Hold him over the light, he loves the light! You see how the light shines through him?

JIM: It sure does shine!

LAURA: I shouldn't be partial, but he is my favorite one.

JIM: What kind of a thing is this one supposed to be?

LAURA: Haven't you noticed the single horn on his forehead?

JIM: A unicorn, huh? LAURA: Mmm-hmmm!

JIM: Unicorns, aren't they extinct in the modern world?

LAURA: I know!

JIM: Poor little fellow, he must feel sort of lonesome.

LAURA: [Smiling] Well, if he does he doesn't complain about it. He stays on a shelf with some horses that don't have horns and all of them seem to get along nicely together.

JIM: How do you know?

LAURA: [Lightly] I haven't heard any arguments among them!

JIM: [Grinning] No arguments, huh? Well, that's a pretty good sign! Where shall I set him?

LAURA: Put him on the table. They all like a change of scenery once in a while!

JIM: [Stretching] Well, well, well, well—Look how big my shadow is when I stretch!

LAURA: Oh, oh, yes—it stretches across the ceiling!

JIM: [Crossing to door] I think it's stopped raining. [Opens fire-escape door] Where does the music come from?

LAURA: From the Paradise Dance Hall across the alley.

JIM: How about cutting the rug a little, Miss Wingfield?

LAURA: Oh, I-

JIM: Or is your program filled up? Let me have a look at it. [Grasps imaginary card] Why, every lance is taken! I'll just have to scratch some out. [Waltz music: "La Golondrina"] Ahhh, a waltz! [He executes some sweeping turns by himself then holds his arms toward Laura]

LAURA: [Breathlessly] I-can't dance!

JIM: There you go, that inferiority stuff!

LAURA: I've never danced in my life!

JIM: Come on, try!

LAURA: Oh, but I'd step on you!
JIM: I'm not made out of glass.

LAURA: How-how-how do we start?

JIM: Just leave it to me. You hold your arms out a little.

LAURA: Like this?

JIM: A little bit higher. Right. Now don't tighten up, that's the main thing about it—relax.

LAURA: [Laughing breathlessly] It's hard not to. JIM: Okay.

LAURA: I'm afraid you can't budge me.

JIM: What do you bet I can't? [He swings her into motion]

LAURA: Goodness, yes, you can!

JIM: Let yourself go, now, Laura, just let yourself go.

LAURA: I'm—
JIM: Come on!
LAURA: Trying!

JIM: Not so stiff- Easy does it!

LAURA: I know but I'm-

JIM: Loosen th' backbone! There now, that's a lot better.

LAURA: Am I?

JIM: Lots, lots better! [He moves her about the room in a clumsy waltz]

LAURA: Oh, my!
JIM: Ha-ha!

LAURA: Oh, my goodness!

JIM: Ha-ha-ha! [They suddenly bump into the table, Jim stops] What did we hit on?

LAURA: Table.

JIM: Did something fall off it? I think-

LAURA: Yes.

JIM: I hope that it wasn't the little glass horse with the horn!

LAURA: Yes.

JIM: Aw, aw, aw. Is it broken?

LAURA: Now it is just like all the other horses.

JIM: It's lost its-

LAURA: Horn! It doesn't matter. Maybe it's a blessing in disguise.

JIM: You'll never forgive me. I bet that that was your favorite piece of glass.

LAURA: I don't have favorites much. It's no tragedy, Freckles. Glass breaks so easily. No matter how careful you are. The traffic jars the shelves and things fall off them.

JIM: Still I'm awfully sorry that I was the cause

LAURA: [Smiling] I'll just imagine he had an operation. The horn was removed to make him feel less—freakish! [They both laugh] Now he will feel more at home with the other horses, the ones that don't have horns . . .

JIM: Ha-ha, that's very funny! [Suddenly serious] I'm glad to see that you have a sense of humor.

You know—you're—well—very different! Surprisingly different from anyone else I know! [His voice hecomes soft and hesitant with a genuine feeling] Do you mind me telling you that? [Laura is abashed beyond speech] I mean it in a nice way... [Laura nods shyly, looking away] You make me feel sort of—I don't know how to put it! I'm usually pretty good at expressing things, but—This is something that I don't know how to say! [Laura touches her throat and clears it—turns the broken unicorn in her hands. Even softer] Has anyone ever told you that you were pretty?

[PAUSE: MUSIC]

[Laura looks up slowly, with wonder, and shakes her head]

Well, you are! In a very different way from anyone else. And all the nicer because of the difference too. [His voice becomes low and husky. Laura turns away, nearly faint with the novelty of her emotions] I wish that you were my sister. I'd teach you to have some confidence in yourself. The different people are not like other people, but being different is nothing to be ashamed of. Because other people are not such wonderful people. They're one hundred times one thousand. You're one times one! They walk all over the earth. You just stay here. They're common as—weeds, but—you—well, you're—Blue Roses!

[IMAGE ON SCREEN: BLUE ROSES]

[MUSIC CHANGES]

LAURA: But blue is wrong for—roses . . . JIM: It's right for you!—You're—pretty!

LAURA: In what respect am I pretty?

your hair—are pretty! Your hands are pretty! [He catches hold of her hand] You think I'm making this up because I'm invited to dinner and have to be nice. Oh, I could do that! I could put on an act for you, Laura, and say lots of things without being very sincere. But this time I am. I'm talking to you sincerely. I happened to notice you had this inferiority complex that keeps you from feeling comfortable with people. Somebody needs to build your confidence up and make you proud instead of shy and turning away and—blushing—Somebody—ought to—ought to—kiss you, Laura! [His hand slips slowly up her arm to her shoulder]

[MUSIC SWELLS TUMULTUOUSLY]

[He suddenly turns her about and kisses her on the lips. When he releases her, Laura sinks on the sofa with a bright, dazed look. Jim backs away and fishes in his pocket for a cigarette] [LEGEND ON SCREEN: "SOUVENIR"]

Stumble-john! [He lights the cigarette, avoiding her look. There is a peal of girlish laughter from Amanda in the kitchen. Laura slowly raises and opens her hand. It still contains the little broken glass animal. She looks at it with a tender, bewildered expression] Stumble-john! I shouldn't have done that — That was way off the beam. You don't smoke, do you? [She looks up, smiling, not hearing the question. He sits beside her a little gingerly. She looks at him speechlessly—waiting. He coughs decorously and moves a little farther aside as he considers the situation and senses her feelings, dimly, with perturbation. Gently] Would you—care for a—mint? [She doesn't seem to hear him but her look grows brighter even] Peppermint—Life-Saver? My pocket's a regular drug store—wherever I go . . . [He pops a mint in his mouth. Then gulps and decides to make a clean breast of it. He speaks slowly and gingerly] Laura, you know, if I had a sister like you, I'd do the same thing as Tom. I'd bring out fellows and—introduce her to them. The right type of boys of a type to—appreciate her. Only—well—he made a mistake about me. Maybe I've got no call to be saying this. That may not have been the idea in having me over. But what if it was? There's nothing wrong about that. The only trouble is that in my case—I'm not in a situation to—do the right thing.

I can't take down your number and say I'll phone. I can't call up next week and—ask for a date. I thought I had better explain the situation in case you—misunderstood it and—hurt your feelings. . . .

[Pause. Slowly, very slowly, Laura's look changes, her eyes returning slowly from his to the ornament in her palm. Amanda utters another gay laugh in the kitchen]

LAURA: [Faintly] You—won't—call again?

JIM: No, Laura, I can't. [He rises from the sofa] As I was just explaining, I've—got strings on me. Laura, I've—been going steady! I go out all of the time with a girl named Betty. She's a home-girl like you, and Catholic, and Irish, and in a great many ways we—get along fine. I met her last summer on a moonlight boat trip up the river to Alton, on the Majestic. Well—right away from the start it was—love!

[LEGEND: LOVE!]

[Laura sways slightly forward and grips the arm of the sofa. He fails to notice, now enrapt in his own comfortable being]

Being in love has made a new man of me! [Leaning stiffly forward, clutching the arm of the sofa, Laura struggles visibly with her storm. But Jim is oblivious, she is a long way off] The power of love is really pretty tremendous! Love is something that -changes the whole world, Laura! [The storm abates a little and Laura leans back. He notices her again] It happened that Betty's aunt took sick, she got a wire and had to go to Centralia. So Tomwhen he asked me to dinner-I naturally just accepted the invitation, not knowing that you—that he -that I-[He stops awkwardly] Huh-I'm a stumble-john! [He flops back on the sofa. The holy candles in the altar of Laura's face have been snuffed out. There is a look of almost infinite desolation. Jim glances at her uneasily I wish that you would—say something. [She bites her lip which was trembling and then bravely smiles. She opens her hand again on the broken glass ornament. Then she gently takes his hand and raises it level with her own. She carefully places the unicorn in the palm of his hand, then pushes his fingers closed upon it] What are you—doing that for? You want me to have him?-Laura? [She nods] What for?

LAURA: A—souvenir . . . [She rises unsteadily and crouches beside the victrola to wind it up]

[LEGEND ON SCREEN: "THINGS HAVE A WAY OF TURNING OUT SO BADLY!"]

[OR IMAGE: "GENTLEMAN CALLER WAVING GOODBYE!—GAILY"]

[At this moment Amanda rushes brightly back in the front room. She bears a pitcher of fruit punch in an old-fashioned cut-glass pitcher and a plate of macaroons. The plate has a gold border and poppies painted on it]

AMANDA: Well, well, well! Isn't the air delightful after the shower? I've made you children a little liquid refreshment. [Turns gaily to the gentleman caller] Jim, do you know that song about lemonade?

"Lemonade, lemonade

Made in the shade and stirred with a spade—Good enough for any old maid!"

JIM: [Uneasily] Ha-ha! No—I never heard it. AMANDA: Why, Laura! You look so serious! JIM: We were having a serious conversation.

AMANDA: Good! Now you're better acquainted!

JIM: [Uncertainly] Ha-ha! Yes.

AMANDA: You modern young people

AMANDA: You modern young people are much more serious-minded than my generation. I was so gay as a girl!

JIM: You haven't changed, Mrs. Wingfield.

AMANDA: Tonight I'm rejuvenated! The gaiety of the occasion, Mr. O'Connor! [She tosses her head with a peal of laughter. Spills lemonade] Oooo! I'm baptizing myself!

JIM: Here-let me-

AMANDA: [Setting the pitcher down] There now. I discovered we had some maraschino cherries. I dumped them in, juice and all!

JIM: You shouldn't have gone to that trouble, Mrs. Wingfield.

AMANDA: Trouble, trouble? Why, it was loads of fun! Didn't you hear me cutting up in the kitchen? I bet your ears were burning! I told Tom how outdone with him I was for keeping you to himself so long a time! He should have brought you over much, much sooner! Well, now that you've found your way, I want you to be a very frequent caller! Not just occasional but all the time. Oh, we're going to have a lot of gay times together! I see them coming! Mmmm, just breathe that air! So fresh, and the moon's so pretty! I'll skip back out—I know where my place is when young folks are having a—serious conversation!

JIM: Oh, don't go out, Mrs. Wingfield. The fact of the matter is I've got to be going.

AMANDA: Going, now? You're joking! Why, it's only the shank of the evening, Mr. O'Connor!

JIM: Well, you know how it is.

AMANDA: You mean you're a young workingman and have to keep workingmen's hours. We'll let you off early tonight. But only on the condition that next time you stay later. What's the best night for you? Isn't Saturday night the best night for you workingmen?

JIM: I have a couple of time-clocks to punch, Mrs. Wingfield. One at morning, another one at night!

AMANDA: My, but you are ambitious! You work at night, too?

JIM: No, Ma'am, not work but—Betty! [He crosses deliberately to pick up his hat. The band at the Paradise Dance Hall goes into a tender waltz]

AMANDA: Betty? Betty? Who's-Betty! [There is an ominous cracking sound in the sky]

JIM: Oh, just a girl. The girl I go steady with! [He smiles charmingly. The sky falls]

[LEGEND: "THE SKY FALLS"]

AMANDA: [A long-drawn exhalation] Ohhhh . . . Is it a serious romance, Mr. O'Connor?

JIM: We're going to be married the second Sunday in June.

AMANDA: Ohhhh—how nice! Tom didn't mention that you were engaged to be married.

JIM: The cat's not out of the bag at the ware-house yet. You know how they are. They call you Romeo and stuff like that. [He stops at the oval mirror to put on his hat. He carefully shapes the brim and the crown to give a discreetly dashing effect] It's been a wonderful evening, Mrs. Wingfield. I guess this is what they mean by Southern hospitality.

AMANDA: It really wasn't anything at all.

JIM: I hope it don't seem like I'm rushing off. But I promised Betty I'd pick her up at the Wabash depot, an' by the time I get my jalopy down there her train'll be in. Some women are pretty upset if you keep 'em waiting.

AMANDA: Yes, I know— The tyranny of women! [Extends her hand] Good-bye, Mr. O'Connor. I wish you luck—and happiness—and success! All three of them, and so does Laura!—Don't you, Laura?

LAURA: Yes!

JIM: [Taking her hand] Good-bye, Laura. I'm certainly going to treasure that souvenir. And don't you forget the good advice I gave you. [Raises his voice to a cheery shout] So long, Shakespeare! Thanks again, ladies—Good night! [He grins and ducks jauntily out. Still bravely grimacing, Amanda closes the door on the gentleman caller. Then she turns back to the room with a puzzled expression. She and Laura don't dare to face each other. Laura crouches beside the victrola to wind it]

AMANDA: [Faintly] Things have a way of turning out so badly. I don't believe that I would play the victrola. Well, well—well—Our gentleman caller was engaged to be married! Tom!

TOM: [From back] Yes, Mother?

AMANDA: Come in here a minute. I want to tell you something awfully funny.

TOM: [Enters with macaroon and a glass of the lemonade] Has the gentleman caller gotten away already?

AMANDA: The gentleman caller has made an early departure. What a wonderful joke you played on us! том: How do you mean?

AMANDA: You didn't mention that he was engaged to be married.

том: Jim? Engaged?

AMANDA: That's what he just informed us. TOM: I'll be jiggered! I didn't know about that.

AMANDA: That seems very peculiar. TOM: What's peculiar about it?

AMANDA: Didn't you call him your best friend down at the warehouse?

TOM: He is, but how did I know?

AMANDA: It seems extremely peculiar that you wouldn't know your best friend was going to be married!

TOM: The warehouse is where I work, not where I know things about people!

AMANDA: You don't know things anywhere! You live in a dream; you manufacture illusions! [He crosses to door] Where are you going?

TOM: I'm going to the movies.

AMANDA: That's right, now that you've had us make such fools of ourselves. The effort, the preparations, all the expense! The new floor lamp, the rug, the clothes for Laura! All for what? To entertain some other girl's fiancé! Go to the movies, go! Don't think about us, a mother deserted, an unmarried sister who's crippled and has no job! Don't let anything interfere with your selfish pleasure! Just go, go, go—to the movies!

TOM: All right, I will! The more you shout about my selfishness to me the quicker I'll go, and I won't go to the movies!

AMANDA: Go, then! Then go to the moon—you selfish dreamer!

[Tom smashes his glass on the floor. He plunges out on the fire-escape, slamming the door. Laura screams—cut by door. Dance-hall music up. Tom goes to the rail and grips it desperately, lifting his face in the chill white moonlight penetrating the narrow abyss of the alley] [LEGEND ON SCREEN: "AND SO GOOD-BYE . . ."] [Tom's closing speech is timed with the interior pantomime. The interior scene is played as though viewed through soundproof glass. Amanda appears to be making a comforting speech to Laura who is huddled upon the sofa. Now that we cannot hear the mother's speech, her silliness is gone and she has dignity and tragic beauty. Laura's dark hair hides her face until at the end of the speech she lifts it to smile at her mother. Amanda's gestures are slow and graceful, almost dance-like, as she comforts the daughter. At the end of her speech she glances a moment at the father's picture—then withdraws through the portieres. At close of Tom's speech, Laura blows out the candles, ending the play!

TOM: I didn't go to the moon, I went much further-for time is the longest distance between two places-Not long after that I was fired for writing a poem on the lid of a shoe-box. I left Saint Louis. I descended the steps of this fire-escape for a last time and followed, from then on, in my father's footsteps, attempting to find in motion what was lost in space-I traveled around a great deal. The cities swept about me like dead leaves, leaves that were brightly colored but torn away from the branches. I would have stopped, but I was pursued by something. It always came upon me unawares, taking me altogether by surprise. Perhaps it was a familiar bit of music. Perhaps it was only a piece of transparent glass-Perhaps I am walking along a street at night, in some strange city, before I have found companions. I pass the lighted window of a shop where perfume is sold. The window is filled with pieces of colored glass, tiny transparent bottles in delicate colors, like bits of a shattered rainbow. Then all at once my sister touches my shoulder. I turn around and look into her eyes . . . Oh, Laura, Laura, I tried to leave you behind me, but I am more faithful than I intended to be! I reach for a cigarette, I cross the street, I run into the movies or a bar, I buy a drink, I speak to the nearest strangeranything that can blow your candles out! [Laura bends over the candles]—for nowadays the world is lit by lightning! Blow out your candles, Lauraand so good-bye. . . . [She blows the candles out]

THE SCENE DISSOLVES

Arthur Miller

(1916----)

n February 10, 1949, Arthur Miller became famous overnight in a manner that would make most American success stories seem comparatively modest; ironically the occasion was the première of Death of a Salesman, which tells the story of a failure caused by its hero's worship of the wrong kind of success. The merits of Death of a Salesman were conceded even by stern critics and officially signalized by five awards, including the Drama Critics Circle award and the Pulitzer Prize. Miller's victory was quick and decisive on Broadway, and in time it spread to England and the Continent. (After an enthusiastically received production in Vienna in March 1950, the play was quickly scheduled for production in Zurich, Munich, and Berlin.) Unlike the heroes of the success stories he viewed with skepticism, Miller amply deserved the good fortune that came to him. He had been working steadily toward excellence and had already distinguished himself with much thoughtful writing in his thirty-three Miller was born to a lower-middle-class Jewish family in New York's Harlem district and was reared in a suburban section of Brooklyn. He grew into a tall, raw-boned lad with a remarkable resemblance to the young Abraham Lincoln. In high school he became a football player. He went on to the University of Michigan, found an able guide in Professor Kenneth E. Rowe of the English department, and discovered an aptitude for playwriting that helped to support him through college. He won the Avery Hopwood award of $500 two successive years and received a $1,250 prize from the Hollywoodfinanced Bureau of New Plays, directed by the Theatre Guild's Theresa Helburn and John Gassner. After graduation from college, in 1938, he found employment on the Federal Theatre's WPA playwriting project during the last four months of its existence. He then supported himself by writing radio plays, chiefly for the Columbia Workshop of the Columbia Broadcasting System and for the Cavalcade of America program. He married a University of Michigan classmate, Mary Grace Slattery, became the father of two children, and settled down to a plain life in Brooklyn remote from Bohemian and fashionable intellectual circles. These details are in Miller's case more than usually important because his strength comes from his ability to wring significance out of common reality. He is an artist and intellectual who identifies himself with average life, understands it well, and defends it with democratic fervor. He likes manual work and neighborliness. He might be described as owning a kinship to Walt Whitman but maintaining a critical rather than rhapsodic attitude toward the life of our democracy.

In 1942, he was chosen, at the recommendation of the producer Herman Shumlin, to collect material for the scenario of Ernie Pyle's The Story of G.I. Joe. To get the background for the film, Miller, who was incapacitated for war service by a football injury, spent six months in ground-forces camps throughout the country, going on maneuvers with the infantry and the tank crews. A diary of his experiences was published in 1944 under the title of Situation Normal. During the war Miller also worked for a while as a steamfitter in the Brooklyn Navy Yard and wrote radio scripts and one-act plays designed to promote civilian morale.

In 1944, Miller had his first production on Broadway: a novelistic and short-lived play, The Man Who Had All the Luck. Although unskillfully made, it was rich with human detail, and its rueful story of people who tried to succeed with an insufficient understanding of reality prefigured Death of a Salesman. A year later, Miller tasted literary success for the first time, with his novel Focus, an account of anti-Semitism in an American community, which he had originally planned as a three-act play.

Encouraged by the success of his novel, Miller spent two years writing another study of American life, this time for the stage. The play, All My Sons, revolved around a small industrialist, Joe Keller, who is saved from bankruptcy by the wartime demand for machine products and who, under pressure, sells defective parts to the air force, thus becoming responsible for the death of twenty-one pilots. He is able to shift the burden of guilt to the shoulders of a little man less rugged than himself, and he wins acquittal. But the conscience of his son indicts him, and before this tribunal there can be no acquittal. Joe Keller's defense is that his motives were the best in the world; a deeply affectionate parent, he wanted to preserve his business for his sons. It was the author's contention that no individual's actions can be self-contained, not even within the compass of a family. Miller, who wrote All My Sons with humane understanding but moral sinew as well as taut dramaturgy, summarized his theme as "the responsibility of man to society" or "the responsibility of a man for his actions, a recognition of his ethical responsibility to the world outside his home as well as in his own home."

More than a drama about war profiteering, All My Sons made a strong impression and won the Drama Critics Circle award for the best play of the season. Its limitations, an overweaving of plot threads and the use of the old-fashioned device of decisive revelations by means of a letter, made it less than the masterpiece some critics thought it to be. But the play was a culmination of technical prowess for Miller in the Ibsen-influenced socialproblem type of drama. It also represented a command of plot structure that was to serve the dramatist extremely well when he turned to his next project, the writing of a play in a free dramatic form. Death of a Salesman would not be so successful a drama of time present and time past, of present action and reminiscence, but for its author's skill in pulling threads together and keeping a tight rein on scenes that would otherwise fly apart.

On the occasion of the première of All My Sons, Miller declared in a press interview: "In all my plays and books I try to take settings and dramatic situations from life which involve real questions of right and wrong. Then I set out, rather implacably and in the most realistic situations I can find, the moral dilemma and try to point a real, though hard, path out. I don't see how you can write anything decent without using the question of right and wrong as the basis." How well this statement applies to Death of a Salesman is readily apparent. The "way out" is not found for its hero, Willy Loman, for the play is an elegy on a life that has failed and has come to its end. It is too late for reformation or for him to take on a new set of values. (Only his son Biff arrives at an understanding of different objectives and a different way of life.) But it is not too late for the spiritual redemption or the burst of heroic determination in defeat which constitutes the essence of the austere art of tragedy.

Willy Loman's story plainly involves a failure of values in the world around him. Willy accepts the denatured ideals of American society—not the values considered the highest but those that were overpublicized in America. He naïvely succumbs to successworship, to the belief that a jolly locker-room personality which makes one not only liked but "well liked" is a substitute for solid accomplishment, and to "the wrong dream" of material success. At the age of sixty-three, he is faced with the failure of this way of life, as an unwanted employee and a parent disappointed in the sons to whom he has imparted his own values. Insofar as mistaken ideas have deluded Willy Loman, the play is social criticism. But it is more than that. It is a character drama so firmly drawn that many Americans, from all walks of life, have identified themselves or their relatives with Willy and have been moved by his pathos and his very human qualities.

Miller rejected the notion that the common world is "below tragedy," and in an essay intended for the published version of Death of a Salesman he wrote that "in essence the tragic hero is intent upon claiming his whole due as a personality," that the commonest man may take on tragic stature "to the extent of his willingness to throw all he has into the contest," and that tragedy springs from "the underlying fear of being displaced, the disaster inherent in being torn away from our chosen image of what and who we are in this world." And by these standards the commonest of men may exhibit man's heroic spirit. Miller believed that his Willy Loman was a character of heroic dimensions and that, for all his pathos, he made Death of a Salesman a tragedy rather than a lament.

Both Miller's theory of tragedy and its applicability to the play are subject to debate. Is "our chosen image of what and who we are" always acceptable, and is it, in Willy's case, worthy of the respect that alone can give us tragic exaltation? Since Miller refused to accept the validity of his hero's factitious view of himself, did the author waste compassion and respect on him? It is possible to contend that he did. Yet most playgoers were willing to accept Death of a Salesman as a tragedy, for Miller supplied his loud-mouthed little man with some magnificence of spirit. Willy fights for his family all his life, carries on a difficult struggle for sales long after he has ceased to be welcome in the market place, and holds on to an impossible dream for his son. If in nothing else, moreover, he is tragically impassioned as a father. Perhaps it is well to make here an old distinction between high tragedy and bourgeois tragedy—that is, tragedy of commonplace life in commonplace circumstances. Willy may be called a suburban King Lear, with sons instead of daughters breaking his heart. Although obviously devoid of the splendor of Shakespeare's old man, limited as Willy is by a small mind and by unelevated language, he is not conceived in merely pathetic terms. He is, for example, more passionate and active than Balzac's Lear, the hero of Père Goriot, who accepts his fate passively. Willy engages in an intense conflict with his son and dies in order to effectuate his hopes for him, refusing to concede defeat for the ideal of success he has set up for him. Since he makes his sacrifice after discovering his own responsibility for Biff's failure, he ennobles himself; his act is a sort of expiation. Since he kills himself in order to leave the boy his insurance immediately after learning that Biff still loves him, it is also plain that the deluded man's inmost desire has been directed at something greater than a salesman's success; he dies as a father, not as a salesman. This transfiguration of a man who would otherwise have to be dismissed as a cheat and dolt endows him with some of the magnitude we expect to find in tragedy.

The tragic quality of Death of a Salesman is more than an academic achievement for the American theatre. In several respects, it represents a culmination of American playwrights' efforts to create a significant American drama. The play carries forward the struggle to create a realistically critical expression of American life, to present the common man as the center of dramatic interest, to find more expressive dramatic forms than the realistic technique permits, and to develop a poetic drama rooted in American speech and manners.

Miller's dramatic approach to the American scene reflects some thirty years of playwriting. Insofar as it exposes the hollowness of materialistic values, Death of a Salesman carries on the cultural rebellion staged by the playwrights, novelists, critics, and artists of the nineteen-twenties. Insofar as it relates the fate of a little man who is worn out with the economic struggle to make a home for his family and is discarded by his employer in old age, Death of a Salesman continues the social discontent of the theatre of the nineteen-thirties. Willy's story is another variant of the treatment of lower-middle-class life developed by Odets and the Group Theatre as part of an analysis of the social system. And the play possesses the tender regard for the average man that American writers have favored when they have gone beyond satirization of the commonplaceness of suburban and small-town life.

Willy's story, however, does not yield the usual realistic chronicle, but is transfigured by the imagination. To tell this tale of a dispossessed and defeated commoner. Miller has retained all the verisimilitude of realistic description. The dialogue is colloquial, the manners are familiar, the background is authentically suburban. But the author has also availed himself of the expressionistic dream or memory sequence that appeared impressively in American drama as early as 1920, when The Emperor Jones was produced at the Provincetown Playhouse. He has even used symbolism for expressive purposes, notably in the treatment of Willy's successful brother, Ben, who went into the jungle and came out a wealthy man. Miller has, in short, succeeded in projecting his social realism, his "humanistic jurisprudence" (as the critic Harold Clurman called it). by imaginative means that tell the story of Willy's errors and failures with dramatic economy and suggestive emphasis. Here, in other words, the expressionistic and realistic styles exist in a fused state.

From this theatrical treatment, finally, emerges a poetic drama not of the first order but rare in the American theatre. Many efforts to create a poetic drama had previously been made in America. O'Neill had developed a mystique of the soul and pitted man against his private demons and inscrutable, often malicious, fate. Maxwell Anderson had chosen a derivative procedure in patterning his historical plays after the older style of tragedy. He had selected high-spirited historical characters, allowed them to speak in more or less formal verse, and permitted them to universalize their emotions and thoughts in time-honored generalizations. He did not depart radically from this approach in Winterset. when he tried to write tragedy on a contemporary theme, with the result that his gangsters seemed to belong to the Elizabethan theatre and his lovers frequently bore an odd resemblance to Romeo and Juliet or Hamlet and Ophelia. Saroyan had given free rein to his fancy and depended upon his intuitions and improvisations to create an overgrown child's view of the world, fresh and naïve but at a considerable remove from the realities of the American scene. He created a poetry of flight. Tennessee Williams was able to develop a poetic drama on the basis of psychological deterioration of sensitive characters who do not belong to the mainstream of American realities. He made drama largely out of private sensibility. Miller's poetic drama is of a different order from all these efforts. It is rooted in everyday reality and employs the general idiom of American speech. It has none of the mystique of O'Neill and none of the formality and generalized rhetoric of Anderson; it never leaves the actual world, it does not cultivate naïveté, and it takes a responsible view of life in our society—and it deals with the men and women who struggle with the everyday reality of the average American rather than with a more or less private world. Miller's poetry of theatre is completely rooted in the world we know. It consists of reality rather than of dreams.

ACT I.

A melody is heard, played upon a flute. It is small and fine, telling of grass and trees and the horizon. The curtain rises.

Before us is the Salesman's house. We are aware of towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides. Only the blue light of the sky falls upon the house and forestage; the surrounding area shows an angry glow of orange. As more light appears, we see a solid vault of apartment houses around the small, fragile-seeming home. An air of the dream clings to the place, a dream rising out of reality. The kitchen at center seems actual enough, for there is a kitchen table with three chairs, and a refrigerator. But no other fixtures are seen. At the back of the kitchen there is a draped entrance, which leads to the living-room. To the right of the kitchen, on a level raised two feet, is a bedroom furnished only with a brass bedstead and a straight chair. On a shelf over the bed a silver athletic trophy stands. A window opens onto the apartment house at the side.

Behind the kitchen, on a level raised six and a half feet, is the boys' bedroom, at present barely visible. Two beds are dimly seen, and at the back of the room a dormer window. (This bedroom is above the unseen living-room.) At the left a stairway curves up to it from the kitchen.

The entire setting is wholly or, in some places, partially transparent. The roof-line of the house is one-dimensional; under and over it we see the apartment buildings. Before the house lies an apron, curving beyond the forestage into the orchestra. This forward area serves as the back yard as well as the locale of all Willy's imaginings and of his city scenes. Whenever the action is in the present the actors observe the imaginary wall-lines, entering the house only through its door at the left. But in the scenes of the past these boundaries are broken, and characters enter or leave a room by stepping: "through" a wall onto the forestage:

From the right, Willy Loman, the Salesman, enters, carrying two large sample cases. The flute plays on. He hears but is not aware of it. He is past sixty years of age, dressed quietly. Even as he crosses the stage to the doorway of the house, his exhaustion is apparent. He unlocks the door, comes into the kitchen, and thankfully lets his burden down, feeling the soreness of his palms. A wordsigh escapes his lips—it might be "Oh, boy, oh, boy." He closes the door, then carries his cases out into the living-room, through the draped kitchen doorway.

Linda, his wife, has stirred in her bed at the right. She gets out and puts on a robe, listening. Most often jovial, she has developed an iron repression of her exceptions to Willy's behavior—she more than loves him, she admires him, as though his mercurial nature, his temper, his massive dreams and little cruelties, served her only as sharp reminders of the turbulent longings within him, longings which she shares but lacks the temperament to utter and follow to their end.

LINDA: [Hearing Willy outside the bedroom, calls with trepidation] Willy!

WILLY: It's all right. I came back.

LINDA: Why? What happened? [Slight pause] Did something happen, Willy?

WILLY: No, nothing happened.

LINDA: You didn't smash the car, did you?

WILLY: [With casual irritation] I said nothing happened. Didn't you hear me?

LINDA: Don't you feel well?

WILLY: I'm tired to the death. [The flute has faded away. He sits on the bed beside her, a little numb] I couldn't make it. I just couldn't make it, Linda.

LINDA: [Very carefully, delicately] Where were you all day? You look terrible.

WILLY: I got as far as a little above Yonkers. I stopped for a cup of coffee. Maybe it was the coffee.

LINDA: What?

where: [After a pause] I suddenly couldn't drive any more. The car kept going off onto the shoulder, y'know?

LINDA: [Helpfully] Oh. Maybe it was the steering again. I don't think Angelo knows the Studebaker.

WILLY: No, it's me, it's me. Suddenly I realize I'm goin' sixty miles an hour and I don't remember the last five minutes. I'm—I can't seem to—keep my mind to it.

LINDA: Maybe it's your glasses. You never went for your new glasses.

WILLY: No, I see everything. I came back ten miles an hour. It took me nearly four hours from Yonkers.

LINDA: [Resigned] Well, you'll just have to take a rest, Willy, you can't continue this way.

WILLY: I just got back from Florida.

LINDA: But you didn't rest your mind. Your mind is overactive, and the mind is what counts, dear.

WILLY: I'll start out in the morning. Maybe I'll feel better in the morning. [She is taking off his shoes] These goddam arch supports are killing me.

LINDA: Take an aspirin, Should I get you an aspirin? It'll soothe you.

willy: [With wonder] I was driving along, you understand? And I was fine. I was even observing the scenery. You can imagine, me looking at scenery, on the road every week of my life. But it's so beautiful up there, Linda, the trees are so thick, and the sun is warm. I opened the windshield and just let the warm air bathe over me. And then all of a sudden I'm goin' off the road! I'm tellin' ya, I absolutely forgot I was driving. If I'd've gone the other way over the white line I might've killed somebody. So I went on again—and five minutes later I'm dreamin' again, and I nearly—[He presses two fingers against his eyes] I have such thoughts, I have such strange thoughts.

LINDA: Willy, dear. Talk to them again. There's no reason why you can't work in New York.

WILLY: They don't need me in New York. I'm the New England man. I'm vital in New England.

LINDA: But you're sixty years old. They can't expect you to keep traveling every week.

WILLY: I'll have to send a wire to Portland. I'm supposed to see Brown and Morrison tomorrow morning at ten o'clock to show the line. Goddammit, I could sell them! [He starts putting on his jacket]

LINDA: [Taking the jacket from him] Why don't you go down to the place tomorrow and tell Howard you've simply got to work in New York? You're too accommodating, dear.

WILLY: If old man Wagner was alive I'd a been in charge of New York now! That man was a prince, he was a masterful man. But that boy of his, that Howard, he don't appreciate. When I went north first time, the Wagner Company didn't know where New England was!

LINDA: Why don't you tell those things to Howard, dear?

WILLY: [Encouraged] I will, I definitely will. Is there any cheese?

LINDA: I'll make you a sandwich.

WILLY: No, go to sleep. I'll take some milk. I'll be up right away. The boys in?

LINDA: They're sleeping. Happy took Biff on a date tonight.

WILLY: [Interested] That so?

LINDA: It was so nice to see them shaving together, one behind the other, in the bathroom. And going out together. You notice? The whole house smells of shaving lotion.

WILLY: Figure it out. Work a lifetime to pay off a house. You finally own it, and there's nobody to live in it.

LINDA: Well, dear, life is a casting off. It's always that way.

WILLY: No, no, some people—some people accomplish something. Did Biff say anything after I went this morning?

LINDA: You shouldn't have criticized him, Willy, especially after he just got off the train. You mustn't lose your temper with him.

WILLY: When the hell did I lose my temper? I simply asked him if he was making any money. Is that a criticism?

LINDA: But, dear, how could he make any money? WILLY: [Worried and angered] There's such an undercurrent in him. He became a moody man. Did he apologize when I left this morning?

LINDA: He was crestfallen, Willy. You know how he admires you. I think if he finds himself, then you'll both be happier and not fight any more.

WILLY: How can he find himself on a farm? Is that a life? A farmhand? In the beginning, when he was young, I thought, well, a young man, it's good for him to tramp around, take a lot of different jobs. But it's more than ten years now and he has yet to make thirty-five dollars a week!

LINDA: He's finding himself, Willy.

WILLY: Not finding yourself at the age of thirtyfour is a disgrace!

LINDA: Shh!

WILLY: The trouble is he's lazy, goddammit!

LINDA: Willy, please!

WILLY: Biff is a lazy bum!

LINDA: They're sleeping. Get something to eat. Go on down.

WILLY: Why did he come home? I would like to know what brought him home.

LINDA: I don't know. I think he's still lost, Willy. I think he's very lost.

WILLY: Biff Loman is lost. In the greatest country in the world a young man with such—personal attractiveness, gets lost. And such a hard worker. There's one thing about Biff—he's not lazy.

LINDA: Never.

WILLY: [With pity and resolve] I'll see him in the morning; I'll have a nice talk with him. I'll get him a job selling. He could be big in no time. My God! Remember how they used to follow him around in high school? When he smiled at one of them their faces lit up. When he walked down the street . . . [He loses himself in reminiscences]

LINDA: [Trying to bring him out of it] Willy, dear, I got a new kind of American-type cheese today. It's whipped.

WILLY: Why do you get American when I like Swiss?

LINDA: I just thought you'd like a change—

WILLY: I don't want a change! I want Swiss cheese. Why am I always being contradicted?

LINDA: [With a covering laugh] I thought it would be a surprise.

WILLY: Why don't you open a window in here, for God's sake?

LINDA: [With infinite patience] They're all open, dear.

WILLY: The way they boxed us in here. Bricks and windows, windows and bricks.

LINDA: We should've bought the land next door.

WILLY: The street is lined with cars. There's not a breath of fresh air in the neighborhood. The grass don't grow any more, you can't raise a carrot in the back yard. They should've had a law against apartment houses. Remember those two beautiful elm trees out there? When I and Biff hung the swing between them?

LINDA: Yeah, like being a million miles from the city.

WILLY: They should've arrested the builder for cutting those down. They massacred the neighborhood. [Lost] More and more I think of those days, Linda. This time of year it was lilac and wisteria. And then the peonies would come out, and the daffodils. What fragrance in this room!

LINDA: Well, after all, people had to move somewhere.

WILLY: No, there's more people now.

LINDA: I don't think there's more people. I think— WILLY: There's more people! That's what ruining this country! Population is getting out of control. The competition is maddening! Smell the stink from that apartment house! And another one on the other side . . . How can they whip cheese?

[On Willy's last line, Biff and Happy raise themselves up in their beds, listening]

LINDA: Go down, try it. And be quiet.

WILLY: [Turning to Linda, guiltily] You're not worried about me, are you, sweetheart?

BIFF: What's the matter?

HAPPY: Listen!

LINDA: You've got too much on the ball to worry about.

WILLY: You're my foundation and my support, Linda.

LINDA: Just try to relax, dear. You make mountains out of molehills.

WILLY: I won't fight with him any more. If he wants to go back to Texas, let him go.

LINDA: He'll find his way.

WILLY: Sure. Certain men just don't get started till later in life. Like Thomas Edison, I think. Or B. F. Goodrich. One of them was deaf. [He starts for the bedroom doorway] I'll put my money on Biff.

LINDA: And Willy—if it's warm Sunday we'll drive in the country. And we'll open the windshield, and take lunch.

WILLY: No, the windshields don't open on the new cars.

LINDA: But you opened it today.

WILLY: Me? I didn't. [He stops] Now isn't that peculiar! Isn't that a remarkable—[He breaks off in amazement and fright as the flute is heard distantly]

LINDA: What, darling?
WILLY: That is the most remarkable thing.

LINDA: What, dear?

WILLY: I was thinking of the Chevvy. [Slight pause] Nineteen twenty-eight . . . when I had that red Chevvy—[Breaks off] That funny? I could a sworn I was driving that Chevvy today.

LINDA: Well, that's nothing. Something must've reminded you.

WILLY: Remarkable. Ts. Remember those days? The way Biff used to simonize that car? The dealer refused to believe there was eighty thousand miles on it. [He shakes his head] Heh! [To Linda] Close your eyes, I'll be right up. [He walks out of the bedroom]

HAPPY: [To Biff] Jesus, maybe he smashed up the car again!

LINDA: [Calling after Willy] Be careful on the stairs, dear! The cheese is on the middle shelf! [She turns, goes over to the bed, takes his jacket, and goes out of the bedroom]

[Light has risen on the boys' room. Unseen, Willy is heard talking to himself, "Eighty thousand miles," and a little laugh. Biff gets out of bed, comes downstage a bit, and stands attentively. Biff is two years older than his brother Happy, well built, but in these days bears a worn air and seems less self-assured. He has succeeded less, and his dreams are stronger and less acceptable than Happy's. Happy is tall, powerfully made. Sexuality is like a visible color on him, or a scent that many women have discovered. He, like his brother, is lost, but in a different way, for he has never allowed himself to turn his face toward defeat and is thus more confused and hard-skinned, although seemingly more content

HAPPY: [Getting out of bed] He's going to get his license taken away if he keeps that up. I'm getting nervous about him, y'know, Biff?

BIFF: His eyes are going.

HAPPY: No, I've driven with him. He sees all right. He just doesn't keep his mind on it. I drove into the city with him last week. He stops at a green light and then it turns red and he goes. [He laughs]

BIFF: Maybe he's color-blind.

HAPPY: Pop? Why he's got the finest eye for color in the business. You know that.

BIFF: [Sitting down on his bed] I'm going to sleep.

HAPPY: You're not still sour on Dad, are you, Biff?

BIFF: He's all right, I guess.

WILLY: [Underneath them, in the living-room] Yes, sir, eighty thousand miles—eighty-two thousand!

BIFF: You smoking?

HAPPY: [Holding out a pack of cigarettes] Want one?

BIFF: [Taking a cigarette] I can never sleep when I smell it.

WILLY: What a simonizing job, heh!

HAPPY: [With deep sentiment] Funny, Biff, y'know? Us sleeping in here again? The old beds. [He pats his bed affectionately] All the talk that went across those two beds, huh? Our whole lives.

BIFF: Yeah. Lotta dreams and plans.

HAPPY: [With a deep and masculine laugh] About five hundred women would like to know what was said in this room.

[They share a soft laugh]

BIFF: Remember that big Betsy something—what the hell was her name—over on Bushwick Avenue?

HAPPY: [Combing his hair] With the collie dog!

BIFF: That's the one. I got you in there, remember?

HAPPY: Yeah, that was my first time—I think. Boy, there was a pig! [They laugh, almost crudely] You taught me everything I know about women. Don't forget that.

BIFF: I bet you forgot how bashful you used to be. Especially with girls.

HAPPY: Oh, I still am, Biff.

BIFF: Oh, go on.

HAPPY: I just control it, that's all. I think I got less bashful and you got more so. What happened, Biff? Where's the old humor, the old confidence? [He shakes Biff's knee. Biff gets up and moves restlessly about the room] What's the matter?

BIFF: Why does Dad mock me all the time?

HAPPY: He's not mocking you, he-

BIFF: Everything I say there's a twist of mockery on his face. I can't get near him.

HAPPY: He just wants you to make good, that's all. I wanted to talk to you about Dad for a long time, Biff. Something's—happening to him. He—talks to himself.

BIFF: I noticed that this morning. But he always mumbled.

HAPPY: But not so noticeable. It got so embarrassing I sent him to Florida. And you know something? Most of the time he's talking to you.

HAPPY: I can't make it out. BIFF: What's he say about me? HAPPY: I think the fact that you're not settled, that you're still kind of up in the air . . .

BIFF: There's one or two other things depressing him, Happy.

HAPPY: What do you mean?

BIFF: Never mind. Just don't lay it all to me. HAPPY: But I think if you just got started—I mean—is there any future for you out there?

BIFF: I tell ya, Hap, I don't know what the future is. I don't know—what I'm supposed to want.

HAPPY: What do you mean?

BIFF: Well, I spent six or seven years after high school trying to work myself up. Shipping clerk, salesman, business of one kind or another. And it's a measly manner of existence. To get on that subway on the hot mornings in summer. To devote your whole life to keeping stock, or making phone calls, or selling or buying. To suffer fifty weeks of the year for the sake of a two-week vacation, when all you really desire is to be outdoors, with your shirt off. And always to have to get ahead of the next fella. And still—that's how you build a future.

HAPPY: Well, you really enjoy it on a farm? Are you content out there?

BIFF: [With rising agitation] Hap, I've had twenty or thirty different kinds of jobs since I left home before the war, and it always turns out the same. I just realized it lately. In Nebraska when I herded cattle, and the Dakotas, and Arizona, and now in Texas. It's why I came home now, I guess, because I realized it. This farm I work on, it's spring there now, see? And they've got about fifteen new colts. There's nothing more inspiring or-beautiful than the sight of a mare and a new colt. And it's cool there now, see? Texas is cool now, and it's spring. And whenever spring comes to where I am, I suddenly get the feeling, my God, I'm not gettin' anywhere! What the hell am I doing, playing around with horses, twenty-eight dollars a week! I'm thirtyfour years old, I oughta be makin' my future. That's when I come running home. And now, I get here, and I don't know what to do with myself. [After a pause] I've always made a point of not wasting my life, and everytime I come back here I know that all I've done is to waste my life.

HAPPY: You're a poet, you know that, Biff? You're a—you're an idealist!

BIFF: No, I'm mixed up very bad. Maybe I oughta get married. Maybe I oughta get stuck into something. Maybe that's my trouble. I'm like a boy. I'm not married, I'm not in business, I just—I'm like a boy. Are you content, Hap? You're a success, aren't you? Are you content?

HAPPY: Hell, no!

BIRF: Why? You're making money, aren't you? HAPPY: [Moving about with energy, expressiveness] All I can do now is wait for the merchandise manager to die. And suppose I get to be merchandise manager? He's a good friend of mine, and he just built a terrific estate on Long Island. And he lived there about two months and sold it, and now he's building another one. He can't enjoy it once it's finished. And I know that's just what I would do. I don't know what the hell I'm workin' for. Sometimes I sit in my apartment—all alone. And I think of the rent I'm paying. And it's crazy. But then, it's what I always wanted. My own apartment, a car, and plenty of women. And still, goddammit, I'm lonely.

BIFF: [With enthusiasm] Listen, why don't you come out West with me?

HAPPY: You and I, heh?

BIFF: Sure, maybe we could buy a ranch. Raise cattle, use our muscles. Men built like we are should be working out in the open.

HAPPY: [Avidly] The Loman Brothers, heh?

BIFF: [With vast affection] Sure, we'd be known all over the counties!

HAPPY: [Enthralled] That's what I dream about, Biff. Sometimes I want to just rip my clothes off in the middle of the store and outbox that goddam merchandise manager. I mean I can outbox, outrun, and outlift anybody in that store, and I have to take orders from those common, petty sons-of-bitches till I can't stand it any more.

BIFF: I'm tellin' you, kid, if you were with me I'd be happy out there.

HAPPY: [Filled with enthusiasm] See, Biff, every-body around me is so false that I'm constantly lowering my ideals . . .

BIFF: Baby, together we'd stand up for one another, we'd have someone to trust.

HAPPY: If I were around you-

BIFF: Hap, the trouble is we weren't brought up to grub for money. I don't know how to do it.

HAPPY: Neither can I! BIFF: Then let's go!

HAPPY: The only thing is—what can you make out there?

BIFF: But look at your friend. Builds an estate and then hasn't the peace of mind to live in it.

HAPPY: Yeah, but when he walks into the store the waves part in front of him. That's fifty-two thousand dollars a year coming through the revolving door, and I got more in my pinky finger than he's got in his head.

BIFF: Yeah, but you just said-

HAPPY: I gotta show some of those pompous, self-important executives over there that Hap Loman can make the grade. I want to walk into the store the way he walks in. Then I'll go with you, Biff. We'll be together yet, I swear. But take those two we had tonight. Now weren't they gorgeous creatures?

BIFF: Yeah, yeah, most gorgeous I've had in years. HAPPY: I get that any time I want, Biff. Whenever I feel disgusted. The only trouble is, it gets like bowling or something. I just keep knockin' them over and it doesn't mean anything. You still run around a lot?

BIFF: Naa. I'd like to find a girl—steady, some-body with substance.

HAPPY: That's what I long for.

BIFF: Go on! You'd never come home.

HAPPY: I would! Somebody with character, with resistance! Like Mom, y'know? You're gonna call me a bastard when I tell you this. That girl Charlotte I was with tonight is engaged to be married in five weeks. [He tries on his new hat]

BIFF: No kiddin'!

HAPPY: Sure, the guy's in line for the vice-presidency of the store. I don't know what gets into me, maybe I just have an overdeveloped sense of competition or something, but I went and ruined her, and furthermore I can't get rid of her. And he's the third executive I've done that to. Isn't that a crummy characteristic? And to top it all, I go to their weddings! [Indignantly, but laughing] Like I'm not supposed to take bribes. Manufacturers offer me a hundred-dollar bill now and then to throw an order their way. You know how honest I am, but it's like this girl, see. I hate myself for it. Because I don't want the girl, and, still, I take it and—I love it!

BIFF: Let's go to sleep.

HAPPY: I guess we didn't settle anything, heh?
BIFF: I just got one idea that I think I'm going to v.

HAPPY: What's that?

BIFF: Remember Bill Oliver?

HAPPY: Sure, Oliver is very big now. You want to work for him again?

BIFF: No, but when I quit he said something to me. He put his arm on my shoulder, and he said, "Biff, if you ever need anything, come to me."

HAPPY: I remember that. That sounds good.

BIFF: I think I'll go to see him. If I could get ten thousand or even seven or eight thousand dollars I could buy a beautiful ranch.

HAPPY: I bet he'd back you. 'Cause he thought highly of you, Biff. I mean, they all do. You're well liked, Biff. That's why I say to come back here, and we both have the apartment. And I'm tellin' you, Biff, any babe you want . . .

BIFF: No, with a ranch I could do the work I like and still be something. I just wonder though. I wonder if Oliver still thinks I stole that carton of basketballs.

HAPPY: Oh, he probably forgot that long ago. It's almost ten years. You're too sensitive. Anyway, he didn't really fire you.

BIFF: Well, I think he was going to. I think that's why I quit. I was never sure whether he knew or not. I know he thought the world of me, though. I was the only one he'd let lock up the place.

WILLY: [Below] You gonna wash the engine, Biff? HAPPY: Shh!

[Biff looks at Happy, who is gazing down, listening. Willy is mumbling in the parlor]

HAPPY: You hear that?

[They listen. Willy laughs warmly]

BIFF: [Growing angry] Doesn't he know Mom can hear that?

WILLY: Don't get your sweater dirty, Biff!

[A look of pain crosses Biff's face]

HAPPY: Isn't that terrible? Don't leave again, will you? You'll find a job here. You gotta stick around. I don't know what to do about him, it's getting embarrassing.

WILLY: What a simonizing job! BIFF: Mom's hearing that!

WILLY: No kiddin', Biff, you got a date? Wonderfull

HAPPY: Go on to sleep. But talk to him in the morning, will you?

BIFF: [Reluctantly getting into bed] With her in the house. Brother!

HAPPY: [Getting into bed] I wish you'd have a good talk with him.

[The light on their room begins to fade]

BIFF: [To himself in hed] That selfish, stupid . . . HAPPY: Sh . . . Sleep, Biff.

[Their light is out. Well before they have finished speaking, Willy's form is dimly seen helow in the darkened kitchen. He opens the refrigerator, searches in there, and takes out a bottle of milk. The apartment houses are fading out, and the entire house and surroundings become covered with leaves. Music insinuates itself as the leaves appear]

WILLY: Just wanna be careful with those girls, Biff, that's all. Don't make any promises. No promises of any kind. Because a girl, y'know, they always believe what you tell 'em, and you're very young, Biff, you're too young to be talking seriously to girls.

[Light rises on the kitchen. Willy, talking, shuts the refrigerator door and comes downstage to the kitchen table. He pours milk into a glass. He is totally immersed in himself, smiling faintly] willy: Too young entirely, Biff. You want to watch your schooling first. Then when you're all set, there'll be plenty of girls for a boy like you. [He smiles broadly at a kitchen chair] That so? The girls pay for you? [He laughs.] Boy, you must really be makin' a hit.

[Willy is gradually addressing—physically—a point off stage, speaking through the wall of the kitchen, and his voice has been rising in volume to that of a normal conversation]

willy: I been wondering why you polish the car so careful. Ha! Don't leave the hubcaps, boys. Get the chamois to the hubcaps. Happy, use newspaper on the windows, it's the easiest thing. Show him how to do it, Biff! You see, Happy? Pad it up, use it like a pad. That's it, that's it, good work. You're doin' all right, Hap. [He pauses, then nods in approbation for a few seconds, then looks upward] Biff, first thing we gotta do when we get time is clip that big branch over the house. Afraid it's gonna fall in a storm and hit the roof. Tell you what. We get a rope and sling her around, and then we climb up there with a couple of saws and take her down. Soon as you finish the car, boys, I wanna see ya. I got a surprise for you, boys.

BIFF: [Offstage] Whatta ya got, Dad?

willy: No, you finish first. Never leave a job till you're finished—remember that. [Looking toward the "big trees"] Biff, up in Albany I saw a beautiful hammock. I think I'll buy it next trip, and we'll hang it right between those two elms. Wouldn't that be something? Just swingin' there under those branches. Boy, that would be . . .

[Young Biff and Young Happy appear from the direction Willy was addressing. Happy carries rags and a pail of water. Biff, wearing a sweater with a block "S," carries a football]

BIFF: [Pointing in the direction of the car offstage] How's that, Pop, professional?

WILLY: Terrific. Terrific job, boys. Good work, Biff.

HAPPY: Where's the surprise, Pop?

WILLY: In the back seat of the car.

HAPPY: Boy! [He runs off]

BIFF: What is it, Dad? Tell me, what'd you buy? WILLY: [Laughing, cuffs him] Never mind, something I want you to have.

BIFF: [Turns and starts off] What is it, Hap? HAPPY: [Offstage] It's a punching bag! BIFF: Oh, Pop!

WILLY: It's got Gene Tunney's signature on it!

[Happy runs onstage with a punching bag]

BIFF: Gee, how'd you know we wanted a punching bag?

WILLY: Well, it's the finest thing for the timing.

HAPPY: [Lies down on his back and pedals with his feet] I'm losing weight, you notice, Pop?

WILLY: [To Happy] Jumping rope is good too. BIFF: Did you see the new football I got?

WILLY: [Examining the ball] Where'd you get a new ball?

BIFF: The coach told me to practice my passing. WILLY: That so? And he gave you the ball, heh? BIFF: Well, I borrowed it from the locker room. [He laughs confidentially]

WILLY: [Laughing with him at the theft] I want you to return that.

HAPPY: I told you he wouldn't like it!

BIFF: [Angrily] Well, I'm bringing it back!

WILLY: [Stopping the incipient argument, to Happy] Sure, he's gotta practice with a regulation ball, doesn't he? [To Biff] Coach'll probably congratulate you on your initiative!

BIFF: Oh, he keeps congratulating my initiative all the time, Pop.

WILLY: That's because he likes you. If somebody else took that ball there'd be an uproar. So what's the report, boys, what's the report?

BIFF: Where'd you go this time, Dad? Gee we were lonesome for you.

WILLY: [Pleased, puts an arm around each boy and they come down to the apron] Lonesome, heh? BIFF: Missed you every minute.

WILLY: Don't say? Tell you a secret, boys. Don't breathe it to a soul. Someday I'll have my own business, and I'll never have to leave home any more.

HAPPY: Like Uncle Charley, heh?

WILLY: Bigger than Uncle Charley! Because Charley is not—liked. He's liked, but he's not—well liked.

BIFF: Where'd you go this time, Dad?

WILLY: Well, I got on the road, and I went north to Providence. Met the Mayor.

BIFF: The Mayor of Providence!

WILLY: He was sitting in the hotel lobby.

BIFF: What'd he say?

WILLY: He said, "Morning!" And I said, "You got a fine city here, Mayor." And then he had coffee with me. And then I went to Waterbury. Waterbury is a fine city. Big clock city, the famous Waterbury clock. Sold a nice bill there. And then Boston—Boston is the cradle of the Revolution. A fine city. And a couple of other towns in Mass., and on to Portland and Bangor and straight home!

BIFF: Gee, I'd love to go with you sometime, Dad.

WILLY: Soon as summer comes.

HAPPY: Promise?

WILLY: You and Hap and I, and I'll show you all the towns. America is full of beautiful towns and fine, upstanding people. And they know me, boys, they know me up and down New England. The finest people. And when I bring you fellas up, there'll be open sesame for all of us, 'cause one thing, boys: I have friends. I can park my car in any street in New England, and the cops protect it like their own. This summer, heh?

BIFF AND HAPPY: [Together] Yeah! You bet!

WILLY: We'll take our bathing suits. HAPPY: We'll carry your bags, Pop!

WILLY: Oh, won't that be something! Me comin' into the Boston stores with you boys carryin' my bags. What a sensation!

[Biff is prancing around, practicing passing the ball]

WILLY: You nervous, Biff, about the game?

BIFF: Not if you're gonna be there.

WILLY: What do they say about you in school, now that they made you captain?

HAPPY: There's a crowd of girls behind him everytime the classes change.

BIFF: [Taking Willy's hand] This Saturday, Pop, this Saturday—just for you, I'm going to break through for a touchdown.

HAPPY: You're supposed to pass.

BIFF: I'm takin' one play for Pop. You watch me, Pop, and when I take off my helmet, that means I'm breakin' out. Then you watch me crash through that line! WILLY: [Kisses Biff] Oh, wait'll I tell this in Boston!

[Bernard enters in knickers. He is younger than Biff, earnest and loyal, a worried boy]

BERNARD: Biff, where are you? You're supposed to study with me today.

WILLY: Hey, looka Bernard. What're you lookin' so anemic about, Bernard?

BERNARD: He's gotta study, Uncle Willy. He's got Regents next week.

HAPPY: [Tauntingly, spinning Bernard around] Let's box, Bernard!

BERNARD: Biff! [He gets away from Happy] Listen, Biff, I heard Mr. Birnbaum say that if you don't start studyin' math he's gonna flunk you, and you won't graduate. I heard him!

WILLY: You better study with him, Biff. Go ahead now.

BERNARD: I heard him!

BIFF: Oh, Pop, you didn't see my sneakers! [He holds up a foot for Willy to look at]

WILLY: Hey, that's a beautiful job of printing!

BERNARD: [Wiping his glasses] Just because he printed University of Virginia on his sneakers doesn't mean they've got to graduate him, Uncle Willy!

WILLY: [Angrily] What're you talking about? With scholarships to three universities they're gonna flunk him?

BERNARD: But I heard Mr. Birnbaum say-

WILLY: Don't be a pest, Bernard! [To his boys] What an anemic!

BERNARD: Okay, I'm waiting for you in my house, Biff.

[Bernard goes off. The Lomans laugh] WILLY: Bernard is not well liked, is he? BIFF: He's liked, but he's not well liked.

HAPPY: That's right, Pop.

WILLY: That's just what I mean. Bernard can get the best marks in school, y'understand, but when he gets out in the business world, y'understand, you are going to be five times ahead of him. That's why I thank Almighty God you're both built like Adonises. Because the man who makes an appearance in the business world, the man who creates personal interest, is the man who gets ahead. Be liked and you will never want. You take me, for instance. I never have to wait in line to see a buyer. "Willy Loman is here!" That's all they have to know, and I go right through.

BIFF: Did you knock them dead, Pop?

WILLY: Knocked 'em cold in Providence, slaughtered 'em in Boston.

HAPPY: [On his back, pedaling again] I'm losing weight, you notice, Pop?

[Linda enters, as of old, a ribbon in her hair, carrying a basket of washing]

LINDA: [With youthful energy] Hello, dear!

WILLY: Sweetheart!

LINDA: How'd the Chevvy run?

WILLY: Chevrolet, Linda, is the greatest car ever built. [To the boys] Since when do you let your mother carry wash up the stairs?

BIFF: Grab hold there, boy! HAPPY: Where to, Mom?

LINDA: Hang them up on the line. And you better go down to your friends, Biff. The cellar is full of boys. They don't know what to do with themselves.

BIFF: Ah, when Pop comes home they can wait! WILLY: [Laughs appreciatively] You better go down and tell them what to do, Biff.

BIFF: I think I'll have them sweep out the furnace room.

WILLY: Good work, Biff.

BIFF: [Goes through wall-line of kitchen to doorway at back and calls down] Felias! Everybody sweep out the furnace room! I'll be right down!

voices: All right! Okay, Biff.

BIFF: George and Sam and Frank, come out back! We're hangin' up the wash! Come on, Hap, on the double! [He and Happy carry out the basket]

LINDA: The way they obey him!

WILLY: Well, that's training, the training. I'm tellin' you, I was sellin' thousands and thousands, but I had to come home.

LINDA: Oh, the whole block'll be at that game. Did you sell anything?

WILLY: I did five hundred gross in Providence and seven hundred gross in Boston.

LINDA: No! Wait a minute, I've got a pencil. [She pulls pencil and paper out of her apron pocket] That makes your commission . . . Two hundred—my God! Two hundred and twelve dollars!

WILLY: Well, I didn't figure it yet, but . . .

LINDA: How much did you do?

WILLY: Well, I—I did—about a hundred and eighty gross in Providence. Well, no—it came to—roughly two hundred gross on the whole trip.

LINDA: [Without hesitation] Two hundred gross. That's . . . [She figures]

WILLY: The trouble was that three of the stores were half closed for inventory in Boston. Otherwise I would broke records.

LINDA: Well, it makes seventy dollars and some pennies. That's very good.

WILLY: What do we owe?

LINDA: Well, on the first there's sixteen dollars on the refrigerator—

WILLY: Why sixteen?

LINDA: Well, the fan belt broke, so it was a dollar eightv.

WILLY: But it's brand new.

LINDA: Well, the man said that's the way it is. Till they work themselves in, y'know.

[They move through the wall-line into the kitchen]

WILLY: I hope we didn't get stuck on that machine,

LINDA: They got the biggest ads of any of them! WILLY: I know, it's a fine machine. What else?

LINDA: Well, there's nine-sixty for the washing machine. And for the vacuum cleaner there's three and a half due on the fifteenth. Then the roof, you got twenty-one dollars remaining.

WILLY: It don't leak, does it?

LINDA: No, they did a wonderful job. Then you owe Frank for the carburetor.

WILLY: I'm not going to pay that man! That goddam Chevrolet, they ought to prohibit the manufacture of that car!

LINDA: Well, you owe him three and a half. And odds and ends, comes to around a hundred and twenty dollars by the fifteenth.

WILLY: A hundred and twenty dollars! My God, if business don't pick up I don't know what I'm gonna do!

LINDA: Well, next week you'll do better.

WILLY: Oh, I'll knock 'em dead next week. I'll go to Hartford. I'm very well liked in Hartford. You know, the trouble is, Linda, people don't seem to take to me.

[They move onto the forestage]

LINDA: Oh, don't be foolish.

WILLY: I know it when I walk in. They seem to laugh at me.

LINDA: Why? Why would they laugh at you? Don't talk that way, Willy.

[Willy moves to the edge of the stage. Linda goes into the kitchen and starts to darn stockings]

WILLY: I don't know the reason for it, but they just pass me by. I'm not noticed.

LINDA: But you're doing wonderful, dear. You're making seventy to a hundred dollars a week.

WILLY: But I gotta be at it ten, twelve hours a day. Other men—I don't know—they do it easier. I don't know why—I can't stop myself—I talk too much. A man oughta come in with a few words. One thing about Charley. He's a man of few words, and they respect him.

LINDA: You don't talk too much, you're just lively.

WILLY: [Smiling] Well, I figure, what the hell, life is short, a couple of jokes. [To himself] I joke too much! [The smile goes]

LINDA: Why? You're-

WILLY: I'm fat. I'm very—foolish to look at, Linda. I didn't tell you, but Christmas time I happened to be calling on F. H. Stewarts, and a salesman I know, as I was going in to see the buyer I heard him say something about—walrus. And I—I cracked him right across the face. I won't take that. I simply will not take that. But they do laugh at me. I know that.

LINDA: Darling . . .

WILLY: I gotta overcome it. I know I gotta overcome it. I'm not dressing to advantage, maybe.

LINDA: Willy, darling, you're the handsomest man in the world—

WILLY: Oh, no, Linda.

LINDA: To me you are. [Slight pause] The hand-

[From the darkness is heard the laughter of a woman. Willy doesn't turn to it, but it continues through Linda's lines]

LINDA: And the boys, Willy. Few men are idolized by their children the way you are.

[Music is heard as behind a scrim, to the left of the house, The Woman, dimly seen, is dressing

WILLY: [With great feeling] You're the best there is, Linda, you're a pal, you know that? On the road on the road I want to grab you sometimes and just kiss the life outa you.

[The laughter is loud now, and he moves into a brightening area at the left, where The Woman has come from behind the scrim and is standing, putting on her hat, looking into a "mirror" and laughing

WILLY: 'Cause I get so lonely-especially when business is bad and there's nobody to talk to. I get the feeling that I'll never sell anything again, that I won't make a living for you, or a business, a business for the boys. [He talks through The Woman's subsiding laughter; The Woman primps at the "mirror"] There's so much I want to make for-

THE WOMAN: Me? You didn't make me, Willy. I picked you.

WILLY: [Pleased] You picked me?

THE WOMAN: [Who is quite proper-looking, Willy's age] I did. I've been sitting at that desk watching all the salesmen go by, day in, day out. But you've got such a sense of humor, and we do have such a good time together, don't we?

WILLY: Sure, sure. [He takes her in his arms] Why do you have to go now?

THE WOMAN: It's two o'clock . . .

WILLY: No, come on in! [He pulls her]

THE WOMAN: . . . my sisters'll be scandalized. When'll you be back?

WILLY: Oh, two weeks about. Will you come up

THE WOMAN: Sure thing. You do make me laugh. It's good for me. [She squeezes his arm, kisses him] And I think you're a wonderful man.

WILLY: You picked me, heh?

THE WOMAN: Sure. Because you're so sweet. And such a kidder.

WILLY: Well, I'll see you next time I'm in Boston. THE WOMAN: I'll put you right through to the WILLY: [Slapping her bottom] Right. Well, bottoms up!

THE WOMAN: [Slaps him gently and laughs] You just kill me, Willy. [He suddenly grabs her and kisses her roughly You kill me. And thanks for the stockings. I love a lot of stockings. Well, good night. WILLY: Good night. And keep your pores open!

THE WOMAN: Oh, Willy!

[The Woman bursts out laughing, and Linda's laughter blends in. The Woman disappears into the dark. Now the area at the kitchen table brightens. Linda is sitting where she was at the kitchen table, but now is mending a pair of her silk stockings]

LINDA: You are, Willy. The handsomest man. You've got no reason to feel that—

WILLY: [Coming out of The Woman's dimming area and going over to Linda] I'll make it all up to you, Linda, I'll--

LINDA: There's nothing to make up, dear. You're doing fine, better than-

WILLY: [Noticing her mending] What's that?

LINDA: Just mending my stockings. They're so expensive-

WILLY: [Angrily, taking them from her] I won't have you mending stockings in this house! Now throw them out!

[Linda puts the stockings in her pocket]

BERNARD: [Entering on the run] Where is he? If he doesn't study!

WILLY: [Moving to the forestage, with great agitation] You'll give him the answers!

BERNARD: I do, but I can't on a Regents! That's a state exam! They're liable to arrest me!

WILLY: Where is he? I'll whip him, I'll whip him! LINDA: And he'd better give back that football, Willy, it's not nice.

WILLY: Biff! Where is he? Why is he taking everything?

LINDA: He's too rough with the girls, Willy. All the mothers are afraid of him!

WILLY: I'll whip him!

BERNARD: He's driving the car without a license! [The Woman's laugh is heard]

WILLY: Shut up!

LINDA: All the mothers—

WILLY: Shut up!

BERNARD: [Backing quietly away and out] Mr. Birnbaum says he's stuck up.

WILLY: Get outa here!

BERNARD: If he doesn't buckle down he'll flunk math! [He goes off]

LINDA: He's right, Willy, you've gotta-

WILLY: [Exploding at her] There's nothing the matter with him! You want him to be a worm like Bernard? He's got spirit, personality . . .

[As he speaks, Linda, almost in tears, exits into the living-room. Willy is alone in the kitchen, wilting and staring. The leaves are gone. It is night again, and the apartment houses look down from behind

WILLY: Loaded with it. Loaded! What is he stealing? He's giving it back, isn't he? Why is he stealing? What did I tell him? I never in my life told him anything but decent things.

[Happy in pajamas has come down the stairs; Willy suddenly becomes aware of Happy's presence]

HAPPY: Let's go now, come on.

WILLY: [Sitting down at the kitchen table] Huh! Why did she have to wax the floors herself? Everytime she waxes the floors she keels over. She knows that!

HAPPY: Sh! Take it easy. What brought you back tonight?

WILLY: I got an awful scare. Nearly hit a kid in Yonkers. God! Why didn't I go to Alaska with my brother Ben that time! Ben! That man was a genius, that man was success incarnate! What a mistake! He begged me to go.

HAPPY: Well, there's no use in-

WILLY: You guys! There was a man started with the clothes on his back and ended up with diamond mines!

HAPPY: Boy, someday I'd like to know how he did it.

WILLY: What's the mystery? The man knew what he wanted and went out and got it! Walked into a jungle, and comes out, the age of twenty-one, and he's rich! The world is an oyster, but you don't crack it open on a mattress!

HAPPY: Pop, I told you I'm gonna retire you for life.

WILLY: You'll retire me for life on seventy goddam dollars a week? And your women and your car and your apartment, and you'll retire me for life! Christ's sake, I couldn't get past Yonkers today! Where are you guys, where are you? The woods are burning! I can't drive a car!

[Charley has appeared in the doorway. He is a large man, slow of speech, laconic, immovable. In all he says, despite what he says, there is pity, and now, trepidation. He has a robe over pajamas, slippers on his feet. He enters the kitchen]

CHARLEY: Everything all right?
HAPPY: Yeah, Charley, everything's . . .

WILLY: What's the matter?

CHARLEY: I heard some noise. I thought something happened. Can't we do something about the walls? You sneeze in here, and in my house hats blow off.

HAPPY: Let's go to bed, Dad. Come on.

[Charley signals to Happy to go]

WILLY: You go ahead, I'm not tired at the moment.

HAPPY: [To Willy] Take it easy, huh? [He exits]

WILLY: What're you doin' up?

CHARLEY: [Sitting down at the kitchen table opposite Willy] Couldn't sleep good. I had a heartburn.

WILLY: Well, you don't know how to eat.

CHARLEY: I eat with my mouth.

WILLY: No, you're ignorant. You gotta know about vitamins and things like that.

CHARLEY: Come on, let's shoot. Tire you out a little.

WILLY: [Hesitantly] All right. You got cards? CHARLEY: [Taking a deck from his pocket] Yeah,

I got them. Someplace. What is it with those vitamins?

WILLY: [Dealing] They build up your bones. Chemistry.

CHARLEY: Yeah, but there's no bones in a heartburn.

WILLY: What are you talkin' about? Do you know the first thing about it?

CHARLEY: Don't get insulted.

WILLY: Don't talk about something you don't know anything about.

[They are playing. Pause]

CHARLEY: What're you doin' home?

WILLY: A little trouble with the car.

CHARLEY: Oh. [Pause] I'd like to take a trip to California.

WILLY: Don't say.

CHARLEY: You want a job?

WILLY: I got a job, I told you that. [After a slight pause] What the hell are you offering me a job for?

CHARLEY: Don't get insulted.

WILLY: Don't insult me.

CHARLEY: I don't see no sense in it. You don't have to go on this way.

WILLY: I got a good job. [Slight pause] What do you keep comin' in here for?

CHARLEY: You want me to go?

WILLY: [After a pause, withering] I can't understand it. He's going back to Texas again. What the hell is that?

CHARLEY: Let him go.

WILLY: I got nothin' to give him, Charley, I'm clean, I'm clean.

CHARLEY: He won't starve. None a them starve Forget about him.

WILLY: Then what have I got to remember?

CHARLEY: You take it too hard. To hell with it When a deposit bottle is broken you don't get you nickel back.

WILLY: That's easy enough for you to say.

CHARLEY: That ain't easy for me to say.

WILLY: Did you see the ceiling I put up in the living-room?

CHARLEY: Yeah, that's a piece of work. To put up a ceiling is a mystery to me. How do you do it?

WILLY: What's the difference?

CHARLEY: Well, talk about it.

WILLY: You gonna put up a ceiling?

CHARLEY: How could I put up a ceiling?

WILLY: Then what the hell are you bothering me for?

CHARLEY: You're insulted again.

WILLY: A man who can't handle tools is not a man. You're disgusting.

CHARLEY: Don't call me disgusting, Willy.

[Uncle Ben, carrying a valise and an umbrella, enters the forestage from around the right corner of the house. He is a stolid man, in his sixties, with a mustache and an authoritative air. He is utterly certain of his destiny, and there is an aura of far places about him. He enters exactly as Willy speaks]

WILLY: I'm getting awfully tired, Ben.

[Ben's music is heard. Ben looks around at everything]

CHARLEY: Good, keep playing; you'll sleep better. Did you call me Ben?

[Ben looks at his watch]

WILLY: That's funny. For a second there you reminded me of my brother Ben.

BEN: I only have a few minutes. [He strolls, inspecting the place. Willy and Charley continue playing]

CHARLEY: You never heard from him again, heh? Since that time?

WILLY: Didn't Linda tell you? Couple of weeks ago we got a letter from his wife in Africa. He died. CHARLEY: That so.

BEN: [Chuckling] So this is Brooklyn, eh?

CHARLEY: Maybe you're in for some of his money. WILLY: Naa, he had seven sons. There's just one opportunity I had with that man . . .

BEN: I must make a train, William. There are several properties I'm looking at in Alaska.

WILLY: Sure, sure! If I'd gone with him to Alaska that time, everything would've been totally different. CHARLEY: Go on, you'd froze to death up there. WILLY: What're you talking about?

BEN: Opportunity is tremendous in Alaska, William. Surprised you're not up there.

WILLY: Sure, tremendous.

CHARLEY: Heh?

WILLY: There was the only man I ever met who knew the answers.

CHARLEY: Who? BEN: How are you all?

WILLY: [Taking a pot, smiling] Fine, fine.

CHARLEY: Pretty sharp tonight. BEN: Is Mother living with you? WILLY: No, she died a long time ago.

CHARLEY: Who?

BEN: That's too bad. Fine specimen of a lady, Mother.

WILLY: [To Charley] Heh?

BEN: I'd hoped to see the old girl.

CHARLEY: Who died?

BEN: Heard anything from Father, have you? WILLY: [Unnerved] What do you mean, who died? CHARLEY: [Taking a pot] What're you talkin' about?

BEN: [Looking at his watch] William, it's half-past eight!

WILLY: [As though to dispel his confusion he angrily stops Charley's hand] That's my build!

CHARLEY: I put the ace-

WILLY: If you don't know how to play the game I'm not gonna throw my money away on you!

CHARLEY: [Rising] It was my ace, for God's sake!

WILLY: I'm through, I'm through! BEN: When did Mother die?

WILLY: Long ago. Since the beginning you never knew how to play cards.

CHARLEY: [Picks up the cards and goes to the door] All right! Next time I'll bring a deck with five WILLY: I don't play that kind of game!

CHARLEY: [Turning to him] You ought to be ashamed of yourself!

WILLY: Yeah?

CHARLEY: Yeah! [He goes out]

WILLY: [Slamming the door after him] Ignoramus! BEN: [As Willy comes toward him through the wall-line of the kitchen] So you're William.

WILLY: [Shaking Ben's hand] Ben! I've been waiting for you so long! What's the answer? How did you do it?

BEN: Oh, there's a story in that.

[Linda enters the forestage, as of old, carrying the wash basket]

LINDA: Is this Ben?

BEN: [Gallantly] How do you do, my dear.

LINDA: Where've you been all these years? Willy's always wondered why you—

WILLY: [Pulling Ben away from her impatiently] Where is Dad? Didn't you follow him? How did you get started?

BEN: Well, I don't know how much you remember.

WILLY: Well, I was just a baby, of course, only three or four years old—

BEN: Three years and eleven months.

WILLY: What a memory, Ben!

BEN: I have many enterprises, William, and I have never kept books.

WILLY: I remember I was sitting under the wagon in—was it Nebraska?

BEN: It was South Dakota, and I gave you a bunch of wild flowers.

WILLY: I remember you walking away down some open road.

BEN: [Laughing] I was going to find Father in Alaska.

WILLY: Where is he?

BEN: At that age I had a very faulty view of geography, William. I discovered after a few days that I was heading due south, so instead of Alaska, I ended up in Africa.

LINDA: Africa!

WILLY: The Gold Coast!

BEN: Principally diamond mines.

LINDA: Diamond mines!

BEN: Yes, my dear. But I've only a few minutes— WILLY: No! Boys! Boys! [Young Biff and Happy appear] Listen to this. This is your Uncle Ben, a great man! Tell my boys, Ben!

BEN: Why, boys, when I was seventeen I walked into the jungle, and when I was twenty-one I walked out. [He laughs] And by God I was rich.

WILLY: [To the boys] You see what I been talking about? The greatest things can happen!

BEN: [Glancing at his watch] I have an appointment in Ketchikan Tuesday week.

WILLY: No, Ben! Please tell about Dad. I want my boys to hear. I want them to know the kind of stock they spring from. All I remember is a man with a big beard, and I was in Mamma's lap, sitting around a fire, and some kind of high music.

BEN: His flute. He played the flute. WILLY: Sure, the flute, that's right!

[New music is heard, a high, rollicking tune] BEN: Father was a very great and a very wild-hearted man. We would start in Boston, and he'd toss the whole family into the wagon, and then he'd drive the team right across the country; through Ohio, and Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and all the Western states. And we'd stop in the towns and sell the flutes that he'd made on the way. Great inventor, Father. With one gadget he made more in a week than a man like you could make in a lifetime.

willy: That's just the way I'm bringing them up, Ben-rugged, well liked, all-around.

BEN: Yeah? [To Biff] Hit that, boy—hard as you can. [He pounds his stomach]

BIFF: Oh, no, sir!

BEN: [Taking boxing stance] Come on, get to me! [He laughs]

WILLY: Go to it, Biff! Go ahead, show him!
BIFF: Okay! [He cocks his fists and starts in]
LINDA: [To Willy] Why must he fight, dear?
BEN: [Sparring with Biff] Good boy! Good boy!

WILLY: How's that, Ben, heh? HAPPY: Give him the left, Biff! LINDA: Why are you fighting?

BEN: Good boy! [Suddenly comes in, trips Biff, and stands over him, the point of his umbrella poised over Biff's eye]

LINDA: Look out, Biff!

BIFF: Gee!

BEN: [Patting Biff's knee] Never fight fair with a stranger, boy. You'll never get out of the jungle that way. [Taking Linda's hand and bowing] It was an honor and a pleasure to meet you, Linda.

LINDA: [Withdrawing her hand coldly, frightened] Have a nice—trip.

BEN: [To Willy] And good luck with your—what do you do?

WILLY: Selling.

BEN: Yes. Well . . . [He raises his hand in fare-well to all]

WILLY: No, Ben, I don't want you to think . . . [He takes Ben's arm to show him] It's Brooklyn, I know, but we hunt too.

BEN: Really, now.

willy: Oh, sure, there's snakes and rabbits and—that's why I moved out here. Why, Biff can fell any one of these trees in no time! Boys! Go right over to where they're building the apartment house and get some sand. We're gonna rebuild the entire front stoop right now! Watch this, Ben!

BIFF: Yes, sir! On the double, Hap!

HAPPY: [As he and Biff run off] I lost weight, Pop, you notice?

[Charley enters in knickers, even before the boys are gone]

CHARLEY: Listen, if they steal any more from that building the watchman'll put the cops on them!

LINDA: [To Willy] Don't let Biff . . .

[Ben laughs lustily]

WILLY: You should seen the lumber they brought home last week. At least a dozen six-by-tens worth all kinds a money.

CHARLEY: Listen, if that watchman-

WILLY: I gave them hell, understand. But I got a couple of fearless characters there.

CHARLEY: Willy, the jails are full of fearless characters.

BEN: [Clapping Willy on the back, with a laugh at Charley] And the stock exchange, friend!

WILLY: [Joining in Ben's laughter] Where are the rest of your pants?

CHARLEY: My wife bought them.

WILLY: Now all you need is a golf club and you can go upstairs and go to sleep. [To Ben] Great athlete! Between him and his son Bernard they can't hammer a nail!

BERNARD: [Rushing in] The watchman's chasing Biff!

WILLY: [Angrily] Shut up! He's not stealing anything!

LINDA: [Alarmed, hurrying off left] Where is he? Biff, dear! [She exits.]

WILLY: [Moving toward the left, away from Ben] There's nothing wrong. What's the matter with you? BEN: Nervy boy. Good!

WILLY: [Laughing] Oh, nerves of iron, that Biff! CHARLEY: Don't know what it is. My New England man comes back and he's bleedin', they murdered him up there.

WILLY: It's contacts, Charley, I got important contacts!

CHARLEY: [Sarcastically] Glad to hear it, Willy. Come in later, we'll shoot a little casino. I'll take some of your Portland money. [He laughs at Willy and exits]

WILLY: [Turning to Ben] Business is bad, it's murderous. But not for me, of course.

BEN: I'll stop by on my way back to Africa.

WILLY: [Longingly] Can't you stay a few days? You're just what I need, Ben, because I—I have a fine position here, but I—well, Dad left when I was such a baby and I never had a chance to talk to him and I still feel—kind of temporay about myself.

BEN: I'll be late for my train.

[They are at opposite ends of the stage]

WILLY: Ben-my boys—can't we talk? They'd go into the jaws of hell for me, see, but I—

BEN: William, you're being first-rate with your boys. Outstanding, manly chaps!

WILLY: [Hanging on to his words] Oh, Ben, that's good to hear! Because sometimes I'm afraid that I'm not teaching them the right kind of— Ben, how should I teach them?

BEN: [Giving great weight to each word, and with a certain vicious audacity] William, when I walked into the jungle, I was seventeen. When I walked out I was twenty-one. And, by God, I was rich! [He goes off into darkness around the right corner of the house]

WILLY: . . . was rich! That's just the spirit I want to imbue them with! To walk into a jungle! I was right! I was right! I was right!

[Ben is gone, but Willy is still speaking to him as Linda, in nightgown and robe, enters the kitchen, glances around for Willy, then goes to the door of the house, looks out and sees him. Comes down to his left. He looks at her]

LINDA: Willy, dear? Willy?

WILLY: I was right!

LINDA: Did you have some cheese? [He can't answer] It's very late, darling. Come to bed, heh?

WILLY: [Looking straight up] Gotta break your neck to see a star in this yard.

LINDA: You coming in?

WILLY: Whatever happened to that diamond watch fob? Remember? When Ben came from Africa that time? Didn't he give me a watch fob with a diamond in it?

LINDA: You pawned it, dear. Twelve, thirteen years ago. For Biff's radio correspondence course.

WILLY: Gee, that was a beautiful thing. I'll take a walk.

LINDA: But you're in your slippers.

WILLY: [Starting to go around the house at the left] I was right! I was! [Half to Linda, as he goes, shaking his head] What a man! There was a man worth talking to. I was right!

LINDA: [Calling after Willy] But in your slippers, Willy!

[Willy is almost gone when Biff, in his pajamas, comes down the stairs and enters the kitchen]

BIFF: What is he doing out there?

LINDA: Sh!

BIFF: God Almighty, Mom, how long has he been doing this?

LINDA: Don't, he'll hear you.

BIFF: What the hell is the matter with him?

LINDA: It'll pass by morning.

BIFF: Shouldn't we do anything?

LINDA: Oh, my dear, you should do a lot of things, but there's nothing to do, so go to sleep.

[Happy comes down the stair and sits on the steps]

HAPPY: I never heard him so loud, Mom.

LINDA: Well, come around more often; you'll hear him. [She sits down at the table and mends the lining of Willy's jacket]

BIFF: Why didn't you ever write me about this, Mom?

LINDA: How would I write to you? For over three months you had no address.

BIFF: I was on the move. But you know I thought of you all the time. You know that, don't you, pal?

LINDA: I know, dear, I know. But he likes to have a letter. Just to know that there's still a possibility for better things.

BIFF: He's not like this all the time, is he?

LINDA: It's when you come home he's always the worst.

BIFF: When I come home?

LINDA: When you write you're coming, he's all smiles, and talks about the future, and—he's just wonderful. And then the closer you seem to come, the more shaky he gets, and then, by the time you get here, he's arguing, and he seems angry at you. I think it's just that maybe he can't bring himself to—to open up to you. Why are you so hateful to each other? Why is that?

BIFF: [Evasively] I'm not hateful, Mom.

LINDA: But you no sooner come in the door than you're fighting!

BIFF: I don't know why. I mean to change. I'm tryin', Mom, you understand?

LINDA: Are you home to stay now?

BIFF: I don't know. I want to look around, see what's doin'.

LINDA: Biff, you can't look around all your life, can you?

BIFF: I just can't take hold, Mom. I can't take hold of some kind of a life.

LINDA: Biff, a man is not a bird, to come and go with the springtime.

BIFF: Your hair . . . [He touches her hair] Your hair got so gray.

LINDA: Oh, it's been gray since you were in high school. I just stopped dyeing it, that's all.

BIFF: Dye it again, will ya? I don't want my pal looking old. [He smiles]

LINDA: You're such a boy! You think you can go away for a year and . . . You've got to get it into your head now that one day you'll knock on this door and there'll be strange people here—

BIFF: What are you talking about? You're not even sixty, Mom.

LINDA: But what about your father? BIFF: [Lamely] Well, I meant him too.

HAPPY: He admires Pop.

LINDA: Biff, dear, if you don't have any feeling for him, then you can't have any feeling for me.

BIFF: Sure I can, Mom.

LINDA: No. You can't just come to see me, because I love him. [With a threat, but only a threat, of tears] He's the dearest man in the world to me, and I won't have anyone making him feel unwanted and low and blue. You've got to make up your mind now, darling, there's no leeway any more. Either he's your father and you pay him that respect, or else you're not to come here. I know he's not easy to get along with—nobody knows that better than me—but . . .

WILLY: [From the left, with a laugh] Hey, hey,

BIFF: [Starting to go out after Willy] What the hell is the matter with him? [Happy stops him]

LINDA: Don't-don't go near him!

BIFF: Stop making excuses for him! He always, always wiped the floor with you. Never had an ounce of respect for you.

HAPPY: He's always had respect for-

BIFF: What the hell do you know about it? HAPPY: [Surlily] Just don't call him crazy!

BIFF: He's got no character— Charley wouldn't do this. Not in his own house-spewing out that vomit from his mind.

HAPPY: Charley never had to cope with what

BIFF: People are worse off than Willy Loman. Believe me, I've seen them!

LINDA: Then make Charley your father, Biff. You can't do that, can you? I don't say he's a great man. Willy Loman never made a lot of money. His name was never in the paper. He's not the finest character that ever lived. But he's a human being, and a terrible thing is happening to him. So attention must be paid. He's not to be allowed to fall into his grave like an old dog. Attention, attention must be finally paid to such a person. You called him crazy-

BIFF: I didn't mean-

LINDA: No. a lot of people think he's lost his balance. But you don't have to be very smart to know what his trouble is. The man is exhausted.

HAPPY: Sure!

LINDA: A small man can be just as exhausted as a great man. He works for a company thirty-six years this March, opens up unheard-of territories to their trademark, and now in his old age they take his salary away.

* HAPPY: [Indignantly] I didn't know that, Mom.

BINDA: You never asked, my dear! Now that you get your spending money someplace else you don't trouble your mind with him.

HAPPY: But I gave you money last-

LINDA: Christmas time, fifty dollars! To fix the hot water it cost ninety-seven fifty! For five weeks he's been on straight commission, like a beginner, an unknown!

BIFF: Those ungrateful bastards!

LINDA: Are they any worse than his sons? When he brought them business, when he was young, they were glad to see him. But now his old friends, the old buyers that loved him so and always found some order to hand him in a pinch—they're all dead, retired. He used to be able to make six, seven calls a day in Boston. Now he takes his valises out of the car and puts them back and takes them out again and he's exhausted. Instead of walking he talks now. He drives seven hundred miles, and when he gets there no one knows him any more, no one welcomes him. And what goes through a man's mind, driving seven hundred miles home without having earned a cent? Why shouldn't he talk to himself? Why? When he has to go to Charley and borrow fifty dollars a week and pretend to me that it's his pay? How long can that go on? How long? You see what I'm sitting here and waiting for? And you tell me he has no character? The man who never worked a day but for your benefit? When does he get the medal for that? Is this his reward-to turn around at the age of sixty-three and find his sons, who he loved better than his life, one a philandering bum-

HAPPY: Mom!

LINDA: That's all you are, my baby! [To Biff] And you! What happened to the love you had for him? You were such pals! How you used to talk to him on the phone every night! How lonely he was till he could come home to you!

BIFF: All right, Mom. I'll live here in my room, and I'll get a job. I'll keep away from him, that's LINDA: No, Biff. You can't stay here and fight all the time.

BIFF: He threw me out of this house, remember that.

LINDA: Why did he do that? I never knew why. BIFF: Because I know he's a fake and he doesn't like anybody around who knows!

LINDA: Why a fake? In what way? What do you mean?

BIFF: Just don't lay it all at my feet. It's between me and him—that's all I have to say. I'll chip in from now on. He'll settle for half my pay check. He'll be all right. I'm going to bed. [He starts for the stairs

LINDA: He won't be all right.

BIFF: [Turning on the stairs, furiously] I hate this city and I'll stay here. Now what do you want? LINDA: He's dying, Biff.

[Happy turns quickly to her, shocked] BIFF: [After a pause] Why is he dying?

LINDA: He's been trying to kill himself.

BIFF: [With great horror] How? LINDA: I live from day to day. BIFF: What're you talking about?

LINDA: Remember I wrote you that he smashed up the car again? In February?

BIFF: Well?

LINDA: The insurance inspector came. He said that they have evidence. That all these accidents in the last year—weren't—weren't—accidents.

HAPPY: How can they tell that? That's a lie.

LINDA: It seems there's a woman . . . [She takes a breath as BIFF: [Sharply but contained] What woman?

| LINDA: [Simultaneously] . . . and this woman . . . LINDA: What?

BIFF: Nothing. Go ahead. LINDA: What did you say?

BIFF: Nothing. I just said what woman?

HAPPY: What about her?

LINDA: Well, it seems she was walking down the road and saw his car. She says that he wasn't driving fast at all, and that he didn't skid. She says he came to that little bridge, and then deliberately smashed into the railing, and it was only the shallowness of the water that saved him.

BIFF: Oh, no, he probably just fell asleep again. LINDA: I don't think he fell asleep.

BIFF: Why not?

LINDA: Last month . . . [With great difficulty] Oh, boys, it's so hard to say a thing like this! He's just a big stupid man to you, but I tell you there's more good in him than in many other people. [She chokes, wipes her eyes] I was looking for a fuse. The lights blew out, and I went down the cellar. And behind the fuse box—it happened to fall out—was a length of rubber pipe—just short.

HAPPY: No kidding?

LINDA: There's a little attachment on the end of it. I knew right away. And sure enough, on the bottom of the water heater there's a new little nipple on the gas pipe.

HAPPY: [Angrily] That—jerk. BIFF: Did you have it taken off?

LINDA: I'm—I'm ashamed to. How can I mention it to him? Every day I go down and take away that little rubber pipe. But, when he comes home, I put it back where it was. How can I insult him that way? I don't know what to do. I live from day to day, boys. I tell you, I know every thought in his mind. It sounds so old-fashioned and silly, but I tell you he put his whole life into you and you've turned your backs on him. [She is bent over in the chair, weeping, her face in her hands] Biff, I swear to God! Biff, his life is in your hands!

HAPPY: [To Biff] How do you like that damned fool!

BIFF: [Kissing her] All right, pal, all right. It's all settled now. I've been remiss. I know that, Mom. But now I'll stay, and I swear to you, I'll apply myself. [Kneeling in front of her, in a fever of self-reproach] It's just—you see, Mom, I don't fit in business. Not that I won't try. I'll try, and I'll make good.

HAPPY: Sure you will. The trouble with you in business was you never tried to please people.

BIFF: I know, I-

HAPPY: Like when you worked for Harrison's. Bob Harrison said you were tops, and then you go and do some damn fool thing like whistling whole songs in the elevator like a comedian.

BIFF: [Against Happy] So what? I like to whistle sometimes.

HAPPY: You don't raise a guy to a responsible job who whistles in the elevator!

LINDA: Well, don't argue about it now.

HAPPY: Like when you'd go off and swim in the middle of the day instead of taking the line around.

BIFF: [His resentment rising] Well, don't you run off? You take off sometimes, don't you? On a nice summer day?

HAPPY: Yeah, but I cover myself!

LINDA: Boys!

HAPPY: If I'm going to take a fade the boss can call any number where I'm supposed to be and they'll swear to him that I just left. I'll tell you something that I hate to say, Biff, but in the business world some of them think you're crazy.

BIFF: [Angered] Screw the business world!

HAPPY: All right, screw it! Great, but cover your-self!

LINDA: Hap, Hap!

BIFF: I don't care what they think! They've laughed at Dad for years, and you know why? Because we don't belong in this nuthouse of a city! We should be mixing cement on some open plain, or—or carpenters. A carpenter is allowed to whistle!

[Willy walks in from the entrance of the house, at left]

WILLY: Even your grandfather was better than a carpenter. [Pause. They watch him] You never grew up. Bernard does not whistle in the elevator, I assure you.

BIFF: [As though to laugh Willy out of it] Yeah, but you do, Pop.

WILLY: I never in my life whistled in an elevator! And who in the business world thinks I'm crazy?

BIFF: I didn't mean it like that, Pop. Now don't make a whole thing out of it, will ya?

WILLY: Go back to the West! Be a carpenter, a cowboy, enjoy yourself!

LINDA: Willy, he was just saying—willy: I heard what he said!

HAPPY: [Trying to quiet Willy] Hey, Pop, come on now . . .

WILLY: [Continuing over Happy's line] They laugh at me, heh? Go to Filene's, go to the Hub, go to Slattery's, Boston. Call out the name Willy Loman and see what happens! Big shot!

BIFF: All right, Pop.

WILLY: Big!

BIFF: All right!

WILLY: Why do you always insult me?

BIFF: I didn't say a word. [To Linda] Did I say a word?

LINDA: He didn't say anything, Willy.

WILLY: [Going to the doorway of the living-room] All right, good night, good night.

LINDA: Willy, dear, he just decided . . .

WILLY: [To Biff] If you get tired hanging around tomorrow, paint the ceiling I put up in the living-room.

BIFF: I'm leaving early tomorrow.

HAPPY: He's going to see Bill Oliver, Pop.

WILLY: [Interestedly] Oliver? For what?

BIFF: [With reserve, but trying, trying] He always said he'd stake me. I'd like to go into business, so maybe I can take him up on it.

LINDA: Isn't that wonderful?

WILLY: Don't interrupt. What's wonderful about it? There's fifty men in the City of New York who'd stake him. [To Biff] Sporting goods?

BIFF: I guess so. I know something about it and— WILLY: He knows something about it! You know sporting goods better than Spalding, for God's sake! How much is he giving you?

BIFF: I don't know, I didn't even see him yet, but-

WILLY: Then what're you talkin' about?

BIFF: [Getting angry] Well, all I said was I'm gonna see him, that's all!

WILLY: [Turning away] Ah, you're counting your chickens again.

BIFF: [Starting left for the stairs] Oh, Jesus, I'm going to sleep!

WILLY: [Calling after him] Don't curse in this house!

BIFF: [Turning] Since when did you get so clean? HAPPY: [Trying to stop them] Wait a . . .

WILLY: Don't use that language to me! I won't have it!

HAPPY: [Grabbing Biff, shouts] Wait a minute! I got an idea. I got a feasible idea. Come here, Biff, let's talk this over now, let's talk some sense here. When I was down in Florida last time, I thought of a great idea to sell sporting goods. It just came back to me. You and I, Biff—we have a line, the Loman Line. We train a couple of weeks, and put on a couple of exhibitions, see?

WILLY: That's an idea!

HAPPY: Wait! We form two basketball teams, see? Two water-polo teams. We play each other. It's a million dollars' worth of publicity. Two brothers, see? The Loman Brothers. Displays in the Royal Palms—all the hotels. And banners over the ring and the basketball court: "Loman Brothers." Baby, we could sell sporting goods!

willy: That is a one-million-dollar idea!

BIFF: I'm in great shape as far as that's concerned. HAPPY: And the beauty of it is, Biff, it wouldn't be like a business. We'd be out playin' ball again . . .

BIFF: [Filled with enthusiasm] Yeah, that's . . .

WILLY: Million-dollar . . .

HAPPY: And you wouldn't get fed up with it, Biff. It'd be the family again. There'd be the old honor, and comradeship, and if you wanted to go off for a swim or somethin'—well, you'd do it! Without some smart cooky gettin' up ahead of you!

WILLY: Lick the world! You guys together could absolutely lick the civilized world.

BIFF: I'll see Oliver tomorrow. Hap, if we could work that out . . .

LINDA: Maybe things are beginning to-

WILLY: [Wildly enthusiastic, to Linda] Stop interrupting! [To Biff:] But don't wear sport jacket and stacks when you see Oliver.

BIFF: No, I'll-

WILLY: A business suit, and talk as little as possible, and don't crack any jokes.

BIFF: He did like me. Always liked me.

LINDA: He loved you!

WILLY: [To Linda] Will you stop! [To Biff] Walk in very serious. You are not applying for a boy's job. Money is to pass. Be quiet, fine, and serious. Everybody likes a kidder, but nobody lends him money.

HAPPY: I'll try to get some myself, Biff. I'm sure I can.

willy: I see great things for you kids, I think your troubles are over. But remember, start big and you'll end big. Ask for fifteen. How much you gonna ask for?

BIFF: Gee, I don't know-

WILLY: And don't say "Gee." "Gee" is a boy's word. A man walking in for fifteen thousand dollars does not say "Gee!"

BIFF: Ten, I think, would be top though.

willy: Don't be so modest. You always started too low. Walk in with a big laugh. Don't look worried. Start off with a couple of your good stories to lighten things up. It's not what you say, it's how you say it—because personality always wins the day.

LINDA: Oliver always thought the highest of him-

WILLY: Will you let me talk?

BIFF: Don't yell at her, Pop, will ya? WILLY: [Angrily] I was talking, wasn't I?

BIFF: I don't like you yelling at her all the time, and I'm tellin' you, that's all.

WILLY: What're you, takin' over this house?

LINDA: Willy-

WILLY: [Turning on her] Don't take his side all the time, god-dammit!

BIFF: [Furiously] Stop yelling at her!

WILLY: [Suddenly pulling on his cheek, beaten down, guilt ridden] Give my best to Bill Oliver—he may remember me. [He exits through the living-room doorway]

LINDA: [Her voice subdued] What'd you have to start that for? [Biff turns away] You see how sweet he was as soon as you talked hopefully? [She goes over to Biff] Come up and say good night to him. Don't let him go to bed that way.

HAPPY: Come on, Biff, let's buck him up.

LINDA: Please, dear. Just say good night. It takes so little to make him happy. Come. [She goes through the living-room doorway, calling upstairs from within the living-room] Your pajamas are hanging in the bathroom, Willy!

HAPPY: [Looking toward where Linda went out] What a woman! They broke the mold when they made her. You know that, Biff?

BIFF: He's off salary. My God, working on commission!

HAPPY: Well, let's face it: he's no hot-shot selling man. Except that sometimes, you have to admit, he's a sweet personality.

BIFF: [Deciding] Lend me ten bucks, will ya? I want to buy some new ties.

HAPPY: I'll take you to a place I know. Beautiful stuff. Wear one of my striped shirts tomorrow.

BIFF: She got gray. Mom got awful old. Gee, I'm gonna go in to Oliver tomorrow and knock him for a—

HAPPY: Come on up. Tell that to Dad. Let's give him a whirl. Come on.

BIFF: [Steamed up] You know, with ten thousand bucks, boy!

HAPPY: [As they go into the living-room] That's the talk, Biff, that's the first time I've heard the old confidence out of you! [From within the living-room, fading off] You're gonna live with me, kid, and any babe you want just say the word . . . [The last lines are hardly heard. They are mounting the stairs to their parents' bedroom]

LINDA: [Entering her bedroom and addressing Willy, who is in the bathroom. She is straightening the bed for him] Can you do anything about the shower? It drips.

WILLY: [From the bathroom] All of a sudden everything falls to pieces! Goddam plumbing, oughta be sued, those people. I hardly finished putting it in and the thing . . . [His words rumble off]

LINDA: I'm just wondering if Oliver will remember him. You think he might?

WILLY: [Coming out of the bathroom in his pajamas] Remember him? What's the matter with you, you crazy? If he'd've stayed with Oliver he'd be on top by now! Wait'll Oliver gets a look at him. You don't know the average caliber any more. The average young man today—[He is getting into bed]—is got a caliber of zero. Greatest thing in the world for him was to bum around.

[Biff and Happy enter the bedroom. Slight pause] WILLY: [Stops short, looking at Biff] Glad to hear it, boy.

HAPPY: We wanted to say good night to you, sport.

WILLY: [To Biff] Yeah. Knock him dead, boy. What'd you want to tell me?

BIFF: Just take it easy, Pop. Good night. [He turns to go].

WILLY: [Unable to resist] And if anything falls off the desk while you're talking to him—like a package or something—don't you pick it up. They have office boys for that.

LINDA: I'll make a big breakfast-

WILLY: Will you let me finish? [To Biff] Tell him you were in the business in the West. Not farm work.

BIFF: All right, Dad.

LINDA: I think everything-

WILLY: [Going right through her speech] And don't undersell yourself. No less than fifteen thousand dollars.

BIFF: [Unable to bear him] Okay. Good night, Mom. [He starts moving]

WILLY: Because you got a greatness in you, Biff, remember that. You got all kinds a greatness. . . . [He lies back, exhausted. Biff walks out]

LINDA: [Calling after Biff] Sleep well, darling! HAPPY: I'm gonna get married, Mom. I wanted to tell you.

LINDA: Go to sleep, dear.

HAPPY: [Going] I just wanted to tell you.

WILLY: Keep up the good work. [Happy exits] God . . . remember that Ebbets Field game? The championship of the city?

LINDA: Just rest. Should I sing to you?

WILLY: Yeah. Sing to me. [Linda hums a soft lul-laby] When that team came out—he was the tallest, remember?

LINDA: Oh, yes. And in gold.

[Biff enters the darkened kitchen, takes a cigarette, and leaves the house. He comes downstage into a golden pool of light. He smokes, staring at the night]

WILLY: Like a young god. Hercules—something like that. And the sun, the sun all around him. Remember how he waved to me? Right up from the field, with the representatives of three colleges standing by? And the buyers I brought, and the cheers when he came out—Loman, Loman, Loman! God Almighty, he'll be great yet. A star like that, magnificent, can never really fade away!

[The light on Willy is fading. The gas heater begins to glow through the kitchen wall, near the stairs, a blue flame beneath red coils]

LINDA: [Timidly] Willy dear, what has he got against you?

WILLY: I'm so tired. Don't talk any more.

[Biff slowly returns to the kitchen. He stops, stares toward the heater]

LINDA: Will you ask Howard to let you work in New York?

WILLY: First thing in the morning. Everything'll be all right.

[Biff reaches behind the heater and draws out a length of rubber tubing. He is horrified and turns his head toward Willy's room, still dimly, lit, from which the strains of Linda's desperate but monotonous humming rise]

WILLY: [Staring through the window into the moonlight] Gee, look at the moon moving between the buildings!

[Biff wraps the tubing around his hand and quickly goes up the stairs]

CURTAIN

ACT II.

Music is heard, gay and bright. The curtain rises as the music fades away. Willy, in shirt sleeves, is sitting at the kitchen table, sipping coffee, his hat in his lap. Linda is filling his cup when she can.

WILLY: Wonderful coffee. Meal in itself.

LINDA: Can I make you some eggs?

WILLY: No. Take a breath.

LINDA: You look so rested, dear.

WILLY: I slept like a dead one. First time in months. Imagine, sleeping till ten on a Tuesday morning. Boys left nice and early, heh?

LINDA: They were out of here by eight o'clock.

WILLY: Good work!

LINDA: It was so thrilling to see them leaving together. I can't get over the shaving lotion in this house!

WILLY: [Smiling] Mmm-

LINDA: Biff was very changed this morning. His whole attitude seemed to be hopeful. He couldn't wait to get downtown to see Oliver.

WILLY: He's heading for a change. There's no question, there simply are certain men that take longer to get—solidified. How did he dress?

LINDA: His blue suit. He's so handsome in that suit. He could be a—anything in that suit!

[Willy gets up from the table. Linda holds his jacket for him]

WILLY: There's no question, no question at all. Gee, on the way home tonight I'd like to buy some seeds.

LINDA: [Laughing] That'd be wonderful. But not enough sun gets back there. Nothing'll grow any more.

WILLY: You wait, kid, before it's all over we're gonna get a little place out in the country, and I'll raise some vegetables, a couple of chickens...

LINDA: You'll do it yet, dear.

[Willy walks out of his jacket. Linda follows him]

WILLY: And they'll get married, and come for a weekend. I'd build a little guest house. 'Cause I got so many fine tools, all I'd need would be a little lumber and some peace of mind.

LINDA: [Joyfully] I sewed the lining . . .

WILLY: I could build two guest houses, so they'd both come. Did he decide how much he's going to ask Oliver for?

LINDA: [Getting him into the jacket] He didn't mention it, but I imagine ten or fifteen thousand. You going to talk to Howard today?

WILLY: Yeah. I'll put it to him straight and simple. He'll just have to take me off the road.

LINDA: And Willy, don't forget to ask for a little advance, because we've got the insurance premium. It's the grace period now.

WILLY: That's a hundred . . . ?

LINDA: A hundred and eight, sixty-eight. Because we're a little short again.

WILLY: Why are we short?

LINDA: Well, you had the motor job on the car . . .

WILLY: That goddam Studebaker!

LINDA: And you got one more payment on the refrigerator . . .

WILLY: But it just broke again!

LINDA: Well, it's old, dear.

WILLY: I told you we should've bought a well-advertised machine. Charley bought a General Electric and it's twenty years old and it's still good, that son-of-a-bitch.

LINDA: But, Willy-

WILLY: Whoever heard of a Hastings refrigerator? Once in my life I would like to own something outright before it's broken! I'm always in a race with the junkyard! I just finished paying for the car and it's on its last legs. The refrigerator consumes belts like a goddam maniac. They time those things. They time them so when you finally paid for them, they're used up.

LINDA: [Buttoning up his jacket as he unbuttons it] All told, about two hundred dollars would carry us, dear. But that includes the last payment on the mortgage. After this payment, Willy, the house belongs to us.

willy: It's twenty-five years!

LINDA: Biff was nine years old when we bought it, WILLY: Well, that's a great thing. To weather a twenty-five year mortgage is—

LINDA: It's an accomplishment.

WILLY: All the cement, the lumber, the reconstruction I put in this house! There ain't a crack to be found in it any more.

LINDA: Well, it served its purpose.

WILLY: What purpose? Some stranger'll come along, move in, and that's that. If only Biff would take this house, and raise a family . . . [He starts to go] Good-by, I'm late.

LINDA: [Suddenly remembering] Oh, I forgot! You're supposed to meet them for dinner.

WILLY: Me?

LINDA: At Frank's Chop House on Forty-eighth near Sixth Avenue.

WILLY: Is that so! How about you?

LINDA: No, just the three of you. They're gonna blow you to a big meal!

WILLY: Don't say! Who thought of that?

LINDA: Biff came to me this morning, Willy, and he said, "Tell Dad, we want to blow him to a big meal." Be there six o'clock. You and your two boys are going to have dinner.

WILLY: Gee whiz! That's really somethin'. I'm gonna knock Howard for a loop, kid. I'll get an advance, and I'll come home with a New York job. Goddammit, now I'm gonna do it!

LINDA: Oh, that's the spirit, Willy!

WILLY: I will never get behind a wheel the rest of my life!

LINDA: It's changing, Willy, I can feel it changing! WILLY: Beyond a question. G'by, I'm late. [He starts to go again]

LINDA: [Calling after him as she runs to the kitchen table for a handkerchief] You got your glasses?

WILLY: [Feels for them, then comes back in] Yeah, yeah, got my glasses.

LINDA: [Giving him the handkerchief] And a handkerchief.

WILLY: Yeah, handkerchief. LINDA: And your saccharine? WILLY: Yeah, my saccharine.

LINDA: Be careful on the subway stairs.

[She kisses him, and a silk stocking is seen hanging from her hand. Willy notices it]

WILLY: Will you stop mending stockings? At least while I'm in the house. It gets me nervous. I can't tell you. Please.

[Linda hides the stocking in her hand as she follows Willy across the forestage in front of the house

LINDA: Remember, Frank's Chop House.

WILLY: [Passing the apron] Maybe beets would grow out there.

LINDA: [Laughing] But you tried so many times. WILLY: Yeah. Well, don't work hard today. [He disappears around the right corner of the house]

LINDA: Be careful.

[As Willy vanishes, Linda waves to him. Suddenly the phone rings. She runs across the stage and into the kitchen and lifts it]

LINDA: Hello? Oh, Biff! I'm so glad you called, I just . . . Yes, sure, I just told him. Yes, he'll be there for dinner at six o'clock. I didn't forget. Listen, I was just dying to tell you. You know that little rubber pipe I told you about? That he connected to the gas heater? I finally decided to go down the cellar this morning and take it away and destroy it. But it's gone! Imagine? He took it away himself, it isn't there! [She listens] When? Oh, then you took it. Oh—nothing, it's just that I'd hoped he'd taken it away himself. Oh, I'm not worried, darling, because this morning he left in such high spirits, it was like the old days! I'm not afraid any more. Did Mr. Oliver see you? . . . Well, you wait there then. And make a nice impression on him, darling. Just don't perspire too much before you see him. And have a nice time with Dad. He may have big news too! . . . That's right, a New York job. And be sweet to him tonight, dear. Be loving to him. Because he's only a little boat looking for a harbor. [She is trembling with sorrow and joy] Oh, that's wonderful, Biff, you'll save his life. Thanks, darling. Just put your arm around him when he comes into the restaurant. Give him a smile. That's the boy . . . Good-by, dear . . . You got your comb? . . . That's fine. Good-by, Biff dear.

[In the middle of her speech, Howard Wagner, thirty-six, wheels on a small typewriter table on which is a wire-recording machine and proceeds to plug it in. This is on the left forestage. Light slowly fades on Linda as it rises on Howard. Howard is intent on threading the machine and only glances over his shoulder as Willy appears]

WILLY: Pst! Pst!

HOWARD: Hello, Willy, come in.

WILLY: Like to have a little talk with you, How-

HOWARD: Sorry to keep you waiting. I'll be with you in a minute.

WILLY: What's that, Howard?

HOWARD: Didn't you ever see one of these? Wire recorder.

WILLY: Oh. Can we talk a minute?

HOWARD: Records things. Just got delivery yesterday. Been driving me crazy, the most terrific machine I ever saw in my life. I was up all night with it.

WILLY: What do you do with it?

HOWARD: I bought it for dictation, but you can do anything with it. Listen to this. I had it home last night. Listen to what I picked up. The first one is my daughter. Get this. [He flicks the switch and "Roll out the Barrel!" is heard being whistled] Listen to that kid whistle.

WILLY: That is lifelike, isn't it?

HOWARD: Seven years old. Get that tone.

WILLY: Ts, ts. Like to ask a little favor of you . . . [The whistling breaks off, and the voice of Howard's daughter is heard]

HIS DAUGHTER: "Now you, Daddy."

HOWARD: She's crazy for me! [Again the same song is whistled] That's me! Ha! [He winks]

WILLY: You're very good!

[The whistling breaks off again. The machine runs silent for a moment]

HOWARD: Sh! Get this now, this is my son.

HIS SON: "The capital of Alabama is Montgomery; the capital of Arizona is Phoenix; the capital of Arkansas is Little Rock; the capital of California is Sacramento . . . " [and on, and on]

HOWARD: [Holding up five fingers] Five years old, Willy.

WILLY: He'll make an announcer some day! HIS SON: [Continuing] "The capital . . ."

HOWARD: Get that—alphabetical order! [The machine breaks off suddenly] Wait a minute. The maid kicked the plug out.

WILLY: It certainly is a-

HOWARD: Sh, for God's sake.

HIS SON: "It's nine o'clock, Bulova watch time. So I have to go to sleep."

WILLY: That really is—

HOWARD: Wait a minute! The next is my wife. [They wait]

HOWARD'S VOICE: "Go on, say something." [Pause] "Well, you gonna talk?"

HIS WIFE: "I can't think of anything."

HOWARD'S VOICE: "Well, talk—it's turning." HIS WIFE: [Shyly, beaten] "Hello." [Silence] "Oh, Howard, I can't talk into this . . . "

HOWARD: [Snapping the machine off] That was my wife.

WILLY: That is a wonderful machine. Can we— HOWARD: I tell you, Willy, I'm gonna take my camera, and my bandsaw, and all my hobbies, and out they go. This is the most fascinating relaxation I ever found.

WILLY: I think I'll get one myself.

HOWARD: Sure, they're only a hundred and a half. You can't do without it. Supposing you wanna hear Jack Benny, see? But you can't be at home at that hour. So you tell the maid to turn the radio on when Jack Benny comes on, and this automatically goes on with the radio . . .

WILLY: And when you come home you . . .

HOWARD: You can come home twelve o'clock, one o'clock, any time you like, and you get yourself a Coke and sit yourself down, throw the switch, and there's Jack Benny's program in the middle of the night!

WILLY: I'm definitely going to get one. Because lots of time I'm on the road, and I think to myself, what I must be missing on the radio!

HOWARD: Don't you have a radio in the car?
WILLY: Well, yeah, but who ever thinks of turning it on?

HOWARD: Say, aren't you supposed to be in Boston?

WILLY: That's what I want to talk to you about, Howard. You got a minute? [He draws a chair in from the wing]

HOWARD: What happened? What're you doing here?

WILLY: Well . . .

HOWARD: You didn't crack up again, did you? WILLY: Oh, no. No . . .

HOWARD: Geez, you had me worried there for a minute. What's the trouble?

WILLY: Well, tell you the truth, Howard. I've come to the decision that I'd rather not travel any more.

HOWARD: Not travel! Well, what'll you do?

WILLY: Remember, Christmas time, when you had the party here? You said you'd try to think of some spot for me here in town.

HOWARD: With us? willy: Well, sure.

HOWARD: Oh, yeah, yeah. I remember. Well, I couldn't think of anything for you, Willy.

WILLY: I tell ya, Howard. The kids are all grown up, y'know. I don't need much any more. If I could take home—well, sixty-five dollars a week, I could swing it.

HOWARD: Yeah, but Willy, see I-

WILLY: I tell ya why, Howard. Speaking frankly and between the two of us, y'know—I'm just a little tired.

HOWARD: Oh, I could understand that, Willy. But you're a road man, Willy, and we do a road business. We've only got a half-dozen salesmen on the floor here.

WILLY: God knows, Howard, I never asked a favor of any man. But I was with the firm when your father used to carry you in here in his arms.

MOWARD: I know that, Willy, but-

WILLY: Your father came to me the day you were born and asked me what I thought of the name of Howard, may he rest in peace.

HOWARD: I appreciate that, Willy, but there just is no spot here for you. If I had a spot I'd slam you right in, but I just don't have a single solitary spot.

[He looks for his lighter. Willy has picked it up and gives it to him. Pause]

WILLY: [With increasing anger] Howard, all I need to set my table is fifty dollars a week.

HOWARD: But where am I going to put you, kid? WILLY: Look, it isn't a question of whether I can sell merchandise, is it?

HOWARD: No, but it's a business, kid, and everybody's gotta pull his own weight.

WILLY: [Desperately] Just let me tell you a story, Howard—

HOWARD: 'Cause you gotta admit, business is business.

WILLY: [Angrily] Business is definitely business, but just listen for a minute. You don't understand this. When I was a boy—eighteen, nineteen—I was already on the road. And there was a question in my mind as to whether selling had a future for me. Because in those days I had a yearning to go to Alaska. See, there were three gold strikes in one month in Alaska, and I felt like going out. Just for the ride, you might say.

HOWARD: [Barely interested] Don't say.

WILLY: Oh, yeah, my father lived many years in Alaska. He was an adventurous man. We've got quite a little streak of self-reliance in our family. I thought I'd go out with my older brother and try to locate him, and maybe settle in the North with the old man. And I was almost decided to go, when I met a salesman in the Parker House. His name was Dave Singleman. And he was eighty-four years old, and he'd drummed merchandise in thirty-one states. And old Dave, he'd go up to his room, y'understand, put on his green velvet slippers—I'll never forget—and pick up his phone and call the buyers, and without ever leaving his room, at the age of eighty-four, he made his living. And when I saw that, I realized that selling was the greatest career a man could want. 'Cause what could be more satisfying than to be able to go, at the age of eightyfour, into twenty or thirty different cities, and pick up a phone, and be remembered and loved and helped by so many different people? Do you know? when he died-and by the way he died the death of a salesman, in his green velvet slippers in the smoker of the New York, New Haven and Hartford, going into Boston-when he died, hundreds of salesmen and buyers were at his funeral. Things were sad on a lotta trains for months after that. [He stands up. Howard has not looked at him] In those days there was personality in it, Howard. There was respect, and comradeship, and gratitude in it. Today, it's all cut and dried, and there's no chance for bringing friendship to bear-or personality. You see what I mean? They don't know me any more.

HOWARD: [Moving away, to the right] That's just the thing, Willy.

WILLY: If I had forty dollars a week—that's all I'd need. Forty dollars, Howard.

HOWARD: Kid, I can't take blood from a stone, I— WILLY: [Desperation is on him now] Howard, the year Al Smith was nominated, your father came to me and—

HOWARD: [Starting to go off] I've got to see some people, kid.

WILLY: [Stopping him] I'm talking about your father! There were promises made across this desk! You mustn't tell me you've got people to see—I put thirty-four years into this firm, Howard, and now I can't pay my insurance! You can't eat the orange and throw the peel away—a man is not a piece of fruit! [After a pause] Now pay attention. Your father—in 1928 I had a big year. I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in commissions.

HOWARD: [Impatiently] Now, Willy, you never averaged—willy: [Banging his hand on the desk] I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in the year of 1928! And your father came to me—or rather, I was in the office here—it was right over this desk—and he put his hand on my shoulder—

HOWARD: [Getting up] You'll have to excuse me, Willy, I gotta see some people. Pull yourself together. [Going out] I'll be back in a little while.

[On Howard's exit, the light on his chair grows very bright and strange.]

WILLY: Pull myself together! What the hell did I say to him? My God, I was yelling at him! How could I! [Willy breaks off, staring at the light, which occupies the chair, animating it. He approaches this chair, standing across the desk from it] Frank, Frank, don't you remember what you told me that time? How you put your hand on my shoulder, and Frank . . . [He leans on the desk and as he speaks the dead man's name he accidentally switches on the recorder, and instantly]

HOWARD'S SON: "... of New York is Albany. The capital of Ohio is Cincinnati, the capital of Rhode Island is ..." [The recitation continues]

WILLY: [Leaping away with fright, shouting] Ha! Howard! Howard! Howard!

HOWARD: [Rushing in] What happened?

WILLY: [Pointing at the machine, which continues nasally, childishly, with the capital cities] Shut it off! Shut it off!

HOWARD: [Pulling the plug out] Look, Willy . . . WILLY: [Pressing his hands to his eyes] I gotta get myself some coffee. I'll get some coffee . . .

[Willy starts to walk out. Howard stops him] HOWARD: [Rolling up the cord] Willy, look . . . WILLY: I'll go to Boston.

HOWARD: Willy, you can't go to Boston for us. WILLY: Why can't I go?

HOWARD: I don't want you to represent us. I've been meaning to tell you for a long time now.

WILLY: Howard, are you firing me?

HOWARD: I think you need a good long rest, Willy. WILLY: Howard—

HOWARD: And when you feel better, come back, and we'll see if we can work something out.

WILLY: But I gotta earn money, Howard. I'm in no position to—

HOWARD: Where are your sons? Why don't your sons give you a hand?

WILLY: They're working on a very big deal.

HOWARD: This is no time for false pride, Willy. You go to your sons and you tell them that you're tired. You've got two great boys, haven't you?

WILLY: Oh, no question, no question, but in the meantime . . .

HOWARD: Then that's that, heh?

WILLY: All right, I'll go to Boston tomorrow.

HOWARD: No. no.

WILLY: I can't throw myself on my sons. I'm not a cripple!

HOWARD: Look, kid, I'm busy this morning.

WILLY: [Grasping Howard's arm] Howard, you've got to let me go to Boston!

HOWARD: [Hard, keeping himself under control] I've got a line of people to see this morning. Sit down, take five minutes, and pull yourself together, and then go home, will ya? I need the office, Willy. [He starts to go, turns, remembering the recorder, starts to push off the table holding the recorder] Oh, yeah. Whenever you can this week, stop by and drop off the samples. You'll feel better, Willy, and then come back and we'll talk. Pull yourself together, kid, there's people outside.

[Howard exits, pushing the table off left. Willy stares into space, exhausted. Now the music is heard—Ben's music—first distantly, then closer, closer. As Willy speaks, Ben enters from the right. He carries valise and umbrella]

WILLY: Oh, Ben, how did you do it? What is the answer? Did you wind up the Alaska deal already? BEN: Doesn't take much time if you know what you're doing. Just a short business trip. Boarding ship in an hour. Wanted to say good-by.

WILLY: Ben, I've got to talk to you.

BEN: [Glancing at his watch] Haven't the time, William.

WILLY: [Crossing the apron to Ben] Ben, nothing's working out. I don't know what to do.

BEN: Now, look here, William. I've bought timberland in Alaska and I need a man to look after things for me.

WILLY: God, timberland! Me and my boys in those grand outdoors!

BEN: You've a new continent at your doorstep, William. Get out of these cities, they're full of talk and time payments and courts of law. Screw on your fists and you can fight for a fortune up there.

WILLY: Yes, yes! Linda, Linda!

[Linda enters as of old, with the wash]

LINDA: Oh, you're back?

BEN: I haven't much time.

WILLY: No, wait! Linda, he's got a proposition for me in Alaska.

LINDA: But you've got—[To Ben] He's got a beautiful job here.

WILLY: But in Alaska, kid, I could-

LINDA: You're doing well enough, Willy!

BEN: [To Linda] Enough for what, my dear?

LINDA: [Frightened of Ben and angry at him] Don't say those things to him! Enough to be happy right here, right now. [To Willy, while Ben laughs] Why must everybody conquer the world? You're well liked, and the boys love you, and someday—[To Ben]—why, old man Wagner told him just the other day that if he keeps it up he'll be a member of the firm, didn't he, Willy?

WILLY: Sure, sure. I am building something with this firm, Ben, and if a man is building something he must be on the right track, mustn't he?

BEN: What are you building? Lay your hand on it. Where is it?

WILLY: [Hesitantly] That's true, Linda, there's nothing.

LINDA: Why? [To Ben] There's a man eighty-four years old—

WILLY: That's right, Ben, that's right. When I look at that man I say, what is there to worry about?

BEN: Bah!

WILLY: It's true, Ben. All he has to do is go into any city, pick up the phone, and he's making his living and you know why?

BEN: [Picking up his valise] I've got to go.

WILLY: [Holding Ben back] Look at this boy!

[Biff, in his high school sweater, enters carrying suitcase. Happy carries Biff's shoulder guards, gold helmet, and football pants]

WILLY: Without a penny to his name, three great universities are begging for him, and from there the sky's the limit, because it's not what you do, Ben. It's who you know and the smile on your face! It's contacts, Ben, contacts! The whole wealth of Alaska passes over the lunch table at the Commodore Hotel, and that's the wonder, the wonder of this country, that a man can end with diamonds here on the basis of being liked! [He turns to Biff] And that's why when you get out on that field today it's important. Because thousands of people will be rooting for you and loving you. [To Ben, who has again begun to leave] And Ben! when he walks into a business office his name will sound out like a bell and all the doors will open to him! I've seen it, Ben, I've seen it a thousand times! You can't feel it with your hand like timber, but it's there!

BEN: Good-by, William.

WILLY: Ben, am I right? Don't you think I'm right? I value your advice.

BEN: There's a new continent at your doorstep, William. You could walk out rich. Rich! [He is gone] willy: We'll do it here, Ben! You hear me? We're gonna do it here!

[Young Bernard rushes in. The gay music of the Boys is heard]

BERNARD: Oh, gee, I was afraid you left already!

WILLY: Why? What time is it? BERNARD: It's half-past one!

WILLY: Well, come on, everybody! Ebbets Field next stop! Where's the pennants? [He rushes through the wall-line of the kitchen and out into the living-room]

LINDA: [To Biff] Did you pack fresh underwear? BIFF: [Who has been limbering up] I want to go! BERNARD: Biff, I'm carrying your helmet, ain't I? HAPPY: No, I'm carrying the helmet.

BERNARD: Oh, Biff, you promised me.

HAPPY: I'm carrying the helmet.

BERNARD: How am I going to get in the locker room?

LINDA: Let him carry the shoulder guards. [She puts her coat and hat on in the kitchen]

BERNARD: Can I, Biff? 'Cause I told everybody I'm going to be in the locker room.

HAPPY: In Ebbets Field it's the clubhouse.

BERNARD: I meant the clubhouse. Biff.

HAPPY: Biff!

BIFF: [Grandly, after a slight pause] Let him carry the shoulder guards.

HAPPY: [As he gives Bernard the shoulder guards] Stay close to us now.

[Willy rushes in with the pennants]

WILLY: [Handing them out] Everybody wave when Biff comes out on the field. [Happy and Bernard run off] You set now, boy?

[The music has died away]

BIFF: Ready to go, Pop. Every muscle is ready.

WILLY: [At the edge of the apron] You realize what this means?

BIFF: That's right, Pop.

WILLY: [Feeling Biff's muscles] You're comin' home this afternoon captain of the All-Scholastic Championship Team of the City of New York.

BIFF: I got it, Pop. And remember, pal, when I take off my helmet, that touchdown is for you.

WILLY: Let's go! [He is starting out, with his arm around Biff, when Charley enters, as of old, in knickers] I got no room for you, Charley.

CHARLEY: Room? For what?

WILLY: In the car.

CHARLEY: You goin' for a ride? I wanted to shoot some casino.

WILLY: [Furiously] Casino! [Incredulously] Don't you realize what today is?

LINDA: Oh, he knows, Willy. He's just kidding you.

WILLY: That's nothing to kid about! CHARLEY: No, Linda, what's goin' on? LINDA: He's playing in Ebbets Field. CHARLEY: Baseball in this weather?

WILLY: Don't talk to him. Come on, come on! [He is pushing them out]

CHARLEY: Wait a minute, didn't you hear the news?

WILLY: What?

CHARLEY: Don't you listen to the radio? Ebbets Field just blew up.

WILLY: You go to hell! [Charley laughs. Pushing them out] Come on, come on! We're late.

CHARLEY: [As they go] Knock a homer, Biff, knock a homer!

WILLY: [The last to leave, turning to Charley] I don't think that was funny, Charley. This is the greatest day of his life.

CHARLEY: Willy, when are you going to grow up? WILLY: Yeah, heh? When this game is over, Charley, you'll be laughing out of the other side of your face. They'll be calling him another Red Grange. Twenty-five thousand a year.

CHARLEY: [Kidding] Is that so?

WILLY: Yeah, that's so.

CHARLEY: Well, then, I'm sorry, Willy. But tell me something.

WILLY: What?

CHARLEY: Who is Red Grange?

WILLY: Put up your hands. Goddam you, put up your hands!

[Charley, chuckling, shakes his head and walks away, around the left corner of the stage. Willy follows him. The music rises to a mocking frenzy]

WILLY: Who the hell do you think you are, better than everybody else? You don't know everything, you big, ignorant, stupid . . . Put up your hands!

[Light rises, on the right side of the forestage, on a small table in the reception room of Charley's office. Traffic sounds are heard. Bernard, now mature, sits whistling to himself. A pair of tennis rackets and an overnight bag are on the floor beside him]

WILLY: [Offstage] What are you walking away for? Don't walk away! If you're going to say something say it to my face! I know you laugh at me behind my back. You'll laugh out of the other side of your goddam face after this game. Touchdown! Touchdown! Eighty thousand people! Touchdown! Right between the goal posts.

[Bernard is a quiet, earnest, but self-assured young man. Willy's voice is coming from right upstage now. Bernard lowers his feet off the table and listens. Jenny, his father's secretary, enters]

JENNY: [Distressed] Say, Bernard, will you go out in the hall?

BERNARD: What is that noise? Who is it?

JENNY: Mr. Loman. He just got off the elevator. BERNARD: [Getting up] Who's he arguing with?

JENNY: Nobody. There's nobody with him. I can't deal with him any more, and your father gets all upset everytime he comes. I've got a lot of typing to do, and your father's waiting to sign it. Will you see him?

WILLY: [Entering] Touchdown! Touch—[He sees Jenny] Jenny, Jenny, good to see you. How're ya? Workin'? Or still honest?

JENNY: Fine. How've you been feeling?

WILLY: Not much any more, Jenny. Ha, ha! [He is surprised to see the rackets]

BERNARD: Hello, Uncle Willy.

WILLY: [Almost shocked] Bernard! Well, look who's here! [He comes quickly, guiltily, to Bernard and warmly shakes his hand]

BERNARD: How are you? Good to see you.

WILLY: What are you doing here?

BERNARD: Oh, just stopped by to see Pop. Get off my feet till my train leaves. I'm going to Washington in a few minutes.

WILLY: Is he in?

BERNARD: Yes, he's in his office with the accountant. Sit down.

WILLY: [Sitting down] What're you going to do in Washington?

BERNARD: Oh, just a case I've got there, Willy. WILLY: That so? [Indicating the rackets] You going to play tennis there?

BERNARD: I'm staying with a friend who's got a court.

WILLY: Don't say. His own tennis court. Must be fine people, I bet.

BERNARD: They are, very nice. Dad tells me Biff's in town.

WILLY: [With a big smile] Yeah, Biff's in. Working on a very big deal, Bernard.

BERNARD: What's Biff doing?

WILLY: Well, he's been doing very big things in the West. But he decided to establish himself here. Very big. We're having dinner. Did I hear your wife had a boy?

BERNARD: That's right. Our second.

WILLY: Two boys! What do you know!

BERNARD: What kind of a deal has Biff got?

WILLY: Well, Bill Oliver—very big sporting-goods man—he wants Biff very badly. Called him in from the West. Long distance, carte blanche, special deliveries. Your friends have their own private tennis court?

BERNARD: You still with the old firm, Willy?

WILLY: [After a pause] I'm—I'm overjoyed to see how you made the grade, Bernard, overjoyed. It's an encouraging thing to see a young man really—really— Looks very good for Biff—very—[He breaks off, then] Bernard—[He is so full of emotion, he breaks off again]

BERNARD: What is it, Willy?

WILLY: [Small and alone] What—what's the

BERNARD: What secret?

WILLY: How—how did you? Why didn't he ever catch on?

BERNARD: I wouldn't know that, Willy.

WILLY: [Confidentially, desperately] You were his friend, his boyhood friend. There's something I don't understand about it. His life ended after that Ebbets Field game. From the age of seventeen nothing good ever happened to him.

BERNARD: He never trained himself for anything. WILLY: But he did, he did. After high school he took so many correspondence courses. Radio mechanics; television; God knows what, and never made the slightest mark.

BERNARD: [Taking off his glasses] Willy, do you want to talk candidly?

WILLY: [Rising, faces Bernard] I regard you as a very brilliant man, Bernard. I value your advice.

BERNARD: Oh, the hell with the advice, Willy. I couldn't advise you. There's just one thing I've always wanted to ask you. When he was supposed to graduate, and the math teacher flunked him—

WILLY: Oh, that son-of-a-bitch ruined his life.

BERNARD: Yeah, but, Willy, all he had to do was go to summer school and make up that subject.

WILLY: That's right, that's right.

BERNARD: Did you tell him not to go to summer school?

WILLY: Me? I begged him to go. I ordered him to go!

BERNARD: Then why wouldn't he go?

WILLY: Why? Why! Bernard, that question has been trailing me like a ghost for the last fifteen years. He flunked the subject, and laid down and died like a hammer hit him!

BERNARD: Take it easy, kid.

WILLY: Let me talk to you—I got nobody to talk to. Bernard, Bernard, was it my fault? Y'see? It keeps going around in my mind, maybe I did something to him. I got nothing to give him.

BERNARD: Don't take it so hard.

WILLY: Why did he lay down? What is the story there? You were his friend!

BERNARD: Willy, I remember, it was June, and our grades came out. And he'd flunked math.

WILLY: That son-of-a-bitch!

BERNARD: No, it wasn't right then. Biff just got very angry, I remember, and he was ready to enroll in summer school.

WILLY: [Surprised] He was?

BERNARO: He wasn't beaten by it at all. But then, Willy, he disappeared from the block for almost a month. And I got the idea that he'd gone up to New England to see you. Did he have a talk with you then?

[Willy stares in silence]

BERNARD: Willy?

WILLY: [With a stronge edge of resentment in his voice] Yeah, he came to Boston. What about it?

BERNARD: Well, just that when he came back—I'll never forget this, it always mystifies me. Because I'd thought so well of Biff, even though he'd always taken advantage of me. I loved him, Willy, y'know?

And he came back after that month and took his sneakers—remember those sneakers with "University of Virginia" printed on them? He was so proud of those, wore them every day. And he took them down in the cellar, and burned them up in the furnace. We had a fist fight. It lasted at least half an hour. Just the two of us, punching each other down the cellar, and crying right through it. I've often thought of how strange it was that I knew he'd given up his life. What happened in Boston, Willy?

[Willy looks at him as at an intruder]

BERNARD: I just bring it up because you asked me.

WILLY: [Angrily] Nothing. What do you mean. "What happened?" What's that got to do with anything?

BERNARD: Well, don't get sore.

WILLY: What are you trying to do, blame it on me? If a boy lays down is that my fault?

BERNARD: Now, Willy, don't get-

WILLY: Well, don't—don't talk to me that way! What does that mean, "What happened?"

[Charley enters. He is in his vest, and he carries a bottle of bourbon]

CHARLEY: Hey, you're going to miss that train. [He waves the bottle]

BERNARD: Yeah, I'm going. [He takes the bottle] Thanks, Pop. [He picks up his rackets and bag] Good-by, Willy, and don't worry about it. You know, "If at first you don't succeed..."

WILLY: Yes, I believe in that.

BERNARD: But sometimes, Willy, it's better for a man just to walk away.

WILLY: Walk away? BERNARD: That's right.

WILLY: But if you can't walk away?

BERNARD: [After a slight pause] I guess that's when it's tough. [Extending his hand] Good-by, Willy.

WILLY: [Shaking Bernard's hand] Good-by, boy. CHARLEY: [An arm on Bernard's shoulder] How do you like this kid? Gonna argue a case in front of the Supreme Court.

BERNARD: [Protesting] Pop!

WILLY: [Genuinely shocked, pained, and happy]
No! The Supreme Court!

BERNARD: I gotta run. 'By, Dad! CHARLEY: Knock 'em dead, Bernard!

[Bernard goes off]

WILLY: [As Charley takes out his wallet] The Supreme Court! And he didn't even mention it!

CHARLEY: [Counting out money on the desk] He don't have to—he's gonna do it.

WILLY: And you never told him what to do, did you? You never took any interest in him.

CHARLEY: My salvation is that I never took any interest in anything. There's some money—fifty dollars. I got an accountant inside.

WILLY: Charley, look . . . [With difficulty] I got my insurance to pay. If you can manage it—I need a hundred and ten dollars.

[Charley doesn't reply for a moment; merely stops moving]

WILLY: I'd draw it from my bank but Linda would know, and I . . .

CHARLEY: Sit down, Willy.

WILLY: [Moving toward the chair] I'm keeping an account of everything, remember. I'll pay every penny back. [He sits]

CHARLEY: Now listen to me, Willy.

WILLY: I want you to know I appreciate . .

CHARLEY: [Sitting down on the table] Willy, what're you doin'? What the hell is goin' on in your head?

WILLY: Why? I'm simply . . .

CHARLEY: I offered you a job. You can make fifty dollars a week. And I won't send you on the road.

WILLY: I've got a job.

CHARLEY: Without pay? What kind of a job is a job without pay? [He rises] Now, look, kid, enough is enough. I'm no genius but I know when I'm being insulted.

WILLY: Insulted!

CHARLEY: Why don't you want to work for me? WILLY: What's the matter with you? I've got a job. CHARLEY: Then what're you walkin' in here every week for?

WILLY: [Getting up] Well, if you don't want me to walk in here—

CHARLEY: I am offering you a job.

WILLY: I don't want your goddam job!

CHARLEY: When the hell are you going to grow up?

WILLY: [Furiously] You big ignoramus, if you say that to me again I'll rap you one! I don't care how big you are! [He's ready to fight]

[Pause]

CHARLEY: [Kindly, going to him] How much do you need, Willy?

WILLY: Charley, I'm strapped, I'm strapped. I don't know what to do. I was just fired.

CHARLEY: Howard fired you?

WILLY: That snotnose. Imagine that? I named him. I named him Howard.

CHARLEY: Willy, when're you gonna realize that them things don't mean anything? You named him Howard, but you can't sell that. The only thing you got in this world is what you can sell. And the funny thing is that you're a salesman, and you don't know that.

WILLY: I've always tried to think otherwise, I guess. I always felt that if a man was impressive, and well liked, that nothing—

CHARLEY: Why must everybody like you? Who liked J. P. Morgan? Was he impressive? In a Turkish bath he'd look like a butcher. But with his pockets on he was very well liked. Now listen, Willy, I know you don't like me, and nobody can say I'm in love with you, but I'll give you a job because—just for the hell of it, put it that way. Now what do you say?

WILLY: I-I just can't work for you, Charley.

CHARLEY: What're you, jealous of me?

WILLY: I can't work for you, that's all, don't ask me why.

CHARLEY: [Angered, takes out more bills] You been jealous of me all your life, you damned fool! Here, pay your insurance. [He puts the money in Willy's hand]

WILLY: I'm keeping strict accounts.

CHARLEY: I've got some work to do. Take care of yourself. And pay your insurance.

WILLY: [Moving to the right] Funny, y'know? After all the highways, and the trains, and the appointments, and the years, you end up worth more dead than alive.

CHARLEY: Willy, nobody's worth nothin' dead. [After a slight pause] Did you hear what I said?

[Willy stands still, dreaming]

CHARLEY: Willy!

WILLY: Apologize to Bernard for me when you see him. I didn't mean to argue with him. He's a fine boy. They're all fine boys, and they'll end up big—all of them. Someday they'll all play tennis together. Wish me luck, Charley. He saw Bill Oliver today.

CHARLEY: Good luck.

WILLY: [On the verge of tears] Charley, you're the only friend I got. Isn't that a remarkable thing? [He goes out]

CHARLEY: Jesus!

[Charley stares after him a moment and follows. All light blacks out. Suddenly raucous music is heard, and a red glow rises behind the screen at right. Stanley, a young waiter, appears, carrying a table, followed by Happy, who is carrying two chairs]

STANLEY: [Putting the table down] That's all right, Mr. Loman, I can handle it myself. [He turns and takes the chairs from Happy and places them at the table]

HAPPY: [Glancing around] Oh, this is better.

STANLEY: Sure, in front there you're in the middle of all kinds a noise. Whenever you got a party, Mr. Loman, you just tell me and I'll put you back here. Y'know, there's a lotta people they don't like it private, because when they go out they like to see a lotta action around them because they're sick and tired to stay in the house by theirself. But I know you, you ain't from Hackensack. You know what I mean?

HAPPY: [Sitting down] So how's it coming, Stanley?

STANLEY: Ah, it's a dog's life. I only wish during the war they'd a took me in the Army. I could been dead by now.

HAPPY: My brother's back, Stanley.

STANLEY: Oh, he come back, heh? From the Far West.

HAPPY: Yeah, big cattle man, my brother, so treat him right. And my father's coming too.

STANLEY: Oh, your father too!

HAPPY: You got a couple of nice lobsters?

STANLEY: Hundred per cent, big. HAPPY: I want them with the claws.

STANLEY: Don't worry, I don't give you no mice. [Happy laughs] How about some wine? It'll put a head on the meal.

HAPPY: No. You remember, Stanley, that recipe I brought you from overseas? With the champagne in it?

STANLEY: Oh, yeah, sure. I still got it tacked up yet in the kitchen. But that'll have to cost a buck apiece anyways.

HAPPY: That's all right.

STANLEY: What'd you, hit a number or somethin'?

HAPPY: No, it's a little celebration. My brother is —I think he pulled off a big deal today. I think we're going into business together.

STANLEY: Great! That's the best for you. Because a family business, you know what I mean?—that's the best.

HAPPY: That's what I think.

STANLEY: 'Cause what's the difference? Somebody steals? It's in the family. Know what I mean? [Sotto voce] Like this bartender here. The boss is goin' crazy what kinda leak he's got in the cash register. You put it in but it don't come out,

HAPPY: [Raising his head] Sh!

STANLEY: What?

HAPPY: You notice I wasn't lookin' right or left, was I?

STANLEY: No.

HAPPY: And my eyes are closed. STANLEY: So what's the—? HAPPY: Strudel's comin'.

STANLEY: [Catching on, looks around] Ah, no, there's no-

[He breaks off as a furred, lavishly dressed girl enters and sits at the next table. Both follow her with their eyes]

STANLEY: Geez, how'd ya know?

HAPPY: I got radar or something. [Staring directly at her profile] Oooooooo . . . Stanley.

STANLEY: I think that's for you, Mr. Loman.

HAPPY: Look at that mouth. Oh, God. And the binoculars.

STANLEY: Geez, you got a life, Mr. Loman.

HAPPY: Wait on her.

STANLEY: [Going to the Girl's table] Would you like a menu, ma'am?

GIRL: I'm expecting someone, but I'd like a—HAPPY: Why don't you bring her—excuse me, miss, do you mind? I sell champagne, and I'd like you to try my brand. Bring her a champagne, Stanley.

GIRL: That's awfully nice of you.

HAPPY: Don't mention it. It's all company money. [He laughs]

GIRL: That's a charming product to be selling, isn't it?

HAPPY: Oh, gets to be like everything else. Selling is selling, y'know.

GIRL: I suppose.

HAPPY: You don't happen to sell, do you?

GIRL: No, I don't sell.

HAPPY: Would you object to a compliment from a stranger? You ought to be on a magazine cover.

GIRL: [Looking at him a little archly] I have been. [Stanley comes in with a glass of champagne] HAPPY: What'd I say before, Stanley? You see?

She's a cover girl.

STANLEY: Oh, I could see, I could see. HAPPY: [To the Girl] What magazine?

GIRL: Oh, a lot of them. [She takes the drink] Thank you.

HAPPY: You know what they say in France, don't you? "Champagne is the drink of the complexion"—Hya, Biff!

[Biff has entered and sits with Happy]

BIFF: Hello, kid. Sorry I'm late.

HAPPY: I just got here. Uh, Miss-?

GIRL: Forsythe.

HAPPY: Miss Forsythe, this is my brother.

BIFF: Is Dad here?

HAPPY: His name is Biff. You might've heard of him. Great football player.

GIRL: Really? What team?

HAPPY: Are you familiar with football?

GIRL: No, I'm afraid I'm not.

HAPPY: Biff is quarterback with the New York Giants.

GIRL: Well, that is nice, isn't it? [She drinks]

HAPPY: Good health.

GIRL: I'm happy to meet you.

HAPPY: That's my name. Hap. It's really Harold, but at West Point they called me Happy.

GIRL: [Now really impressed] Oh, I see. How do you do? [She turns her profile]

BIFF: Isn't Dad coming? HAPPY: You want her?

BIFF: Oh, I could never make that.

HAPPY: I remember the time that idea would never come into your head. Where's the old confidence, Biff?

BIFF: I just saw Oliver-

HAPPY: Wait a minute. I've got to see that old confidence again. Do you want her? She's on call.

BIFF: Oh, no. [He turns to look at the Girl]

HAPPY: I'm telling you. Watch this. [Turning to the Girl] Honey? [She turns to him] Are you busy? GIRL: Well, I am . . . but I could make a phone call.

HAPPY: Do that, will you, honey? And see if you can get a friend. We'll be here for a while. Biff is one of the greatest football players in the country.

GIRL: [Standing up] Well, I'm certainly happy to meet you.

HAPPY: Come back soon.

GIRL: I'll try.

HAPPY: Don't try, honey, try hard.

[The Girl exits. Stanley follows, shaking his head in bewildered admiration]

HAPPY: Isn't that a shame now? A beautiful girl like that? That's why I can't get married. There's not a good woman in a thousand. New York is loaded with them, kid!

BIFF: Hap, look-

HAPPY: I told you she was on call!

BIFF: [Strangely unnerved] Cut it out, will ya? I want to say something to you.

HAPPY: Did you see Oliver?

BIFF: I saw him all right. Now look, I want to tell Dad a couple of things and I want you to help me.

HAPPY: What? Is he going to back you?

BIFF: Are you crazy? You're out of your goddam head, you know that?

HAPPY: Why? What happened?

BIFF: [Breathlessly] I did a terrible thing today, Hap. It's been the strangest day I ever went through. I'm all numb, I swear.

HAPPY: You mean he wouldn't see you?

BIFF: Well, I waited six hours for him, see? All day. Kept sending my name in. Even tried to date his secretary so she'd get me to him, but no soap.

HAPPY: Because you're not showin' the old confidence, Biff. He remembered you, didn't he?

BIFF: [Stopping Happy with a gesture] Finally, about five o'clock, he comes out. Didn't remember who I was or anything. I felt like such an idiot, Hap. HAPPY: Did you tell him my Florida idea?

BIFF: He walked away. I saw him for one minute. I got so mad I could've torn the walls down! How the hell did I ever get the idea I was a salesman there? I even believed myself that I'd been a salesman for him! And then he gave me one look and—I realized what a ridiculous lie my whole life has been! We've been talking in a dream for fifteen years. I was a shipping clerk.

HAPPY: What'd you do?

BIFF: [With great tension and wonder] Well, he left, see. And the secretary went out. I was all alone in the waiting-room. I don't know what came over me, Hap. The next thing I know I'm in his office—paneled walls, everything. I can't explain it. I—Hap, I took his fountain pen.

HAPPY: Geez, did he catch you?

BIFF: I ran out. I ran down all eleven flights. I ran and ran and ran.

HAPPY: That was an awful dumb—what'd you do that for?

BIFF: [Agonized] I don't know, I just—wanted to take something, I don't know. You gotta help me, Hap, I'm gonna tell Pop.

HAPPY: You crazy? What for?

BIFF: Hap, he's got to understand that I'm not the man somebody lends that kind of money to. He thinks I've been spiting him all these years and it's eating him up.

HAPPY: That's just it. You tell him something nice.

BIFF: I can't.

HAPPY: Say you got a lunch date with Oliver tomorrow.

BIFF: So what do I do tomorrow?

HAPPY: You leave the house tomorrow and come back at night and say Oliver is thinking it over. And he thinks it over for a couple of weeks, and gradually it fades away and nobody's the worse.

BIFF: But it'll go on forever!

HAPPY: Dad is never so happy as when he's looking forward to something!

[Willy enters]

HAPPY: Hello, scout!

WILLY: Gee, I haven't been here in years!

[Stanley has followed Willy in and sets a chair for him. Stanley starts off but Happy stops him]

HAPPY: Stanley!

[Stanley stands by, waiting for an order]

BIFF: [Going to Willy with guilt, as to an invalid] Sit down, Pop. You want a drink?

WILLY: Sure, I don't mind. BIFF: Let's get a load on. WILLY: You look worried.

 ${\tt BIFF:}$ N-no. [To Stanley] Scotch all around. Make it doubles.

STANLEY: Doubles, right. [He goes]

WILLY: You had a couple already, didn't you?

BIFF: Just a couple, yeah.

WILLY: Well, what happened, boy? [Nodding affirmatively, with a smile] Everything go all right?

BIFF: [Takes a breath, then reaches out and grasps Willy's hand] Pal... [He is smiling bravely, and Willy is smiling too] I had an experience today.

HAPPY: Terrific, Pop.

WILLY: That so? What happened?

BIFF: [High, slightly alcoholic, above the earth] I'm going to tell you everything from first to last. It's been a strange day. [Silence. He looks around, composes himself as best he can, but his breath keeps breaking the rhythm of his voice] I had to wait quite a while for him, and—

WILLY: Oliver?

BIFF: Yeah, Oliver. All day, as a matter of cold fact. And a lot of—instances—facts, Pop, facts about my life came back to me. Who was it, Pop? Who ever said I was a salesman with Oliver?

WILLY: Well, you were.

BIFF: No, Dad, I was a shipping clerk.

WILLY: But you were practically-

BIFF: [With determination] Dad, I don't know who said it first, but I was never a salesman for Bill Oliver.

WILLY: What're you talking about?

BIFF: Let's hold on to the facts tonight, Pop.

We're not going to get anywhere bullin' around. I was a shipping clerk.

WILLY: [Angrily] All right, now listen to me-

BIFF: Why don't you let me finish?

WILLY: I'm not interested in stories about the past or any crap of that kind because the woods are burning, boys, you understand? There's a big blaze going on all around. I was fired today.

BIFF: [Shocked] How could you be?

WILLY: I was fired, and I'm looking for a little good news to tell your mother, because the woman has waited and the woman has suffered. The gist of it is that I haven't got a story left in my head, Biff. So don't give me a lecture about facts and aspects. I am not interested. Now what've you got to say to me?

[Stanley enters with three drinks. They wait until he leaves]

WILLY: Did you see Oliver?

BIFF: Jesus, Dad!

WILLY: You mean you didn't go up there?

HAPPY: Sure he went up there.

BIFF: I did. I saw him. How could they fire you? WILLY: [On the edge of his chair] What kind of a welcome did he give you?

BIFF: He won't even let you work on commis-

WILLY: I'm out! [Driving] So tell me, he gave you a warm welcome?

HAPPY: Sure, Pop, sure!

BIFF: [Driven] Well, it was kind of-

WILLY: I was wondering if he'd remember you. [To Happy] Imagine, man doesn't see him for ten, twelve years and gives him that kind of a welcome! HAPPY: Damn right!

BIFF: [Trying to return to the offensive] Pop,

WILLY: You know why he remembered you, don't you? Because you impressed him in those days. BIFF: Let's talk quietly and get this down to the facts, huh?

WILLY: [As though Biff had been interrupting] Well, what happened? It's great news, Biff. Did he take you into his office or'd you talk in the waitingroom?

BIFF: Well, he came in, see, and-

WILLY: [With a big smile] What'd he say? Betcha he threw his arm around you.

BIFF: Well, he kinda-

WILLY: He's a fine man. [To Happy] Very hard man to see, y'know.

HAPPY: [Agreeing] Oh, I know.

WILLY: [To Biff] Is that where you had the drinks?

BIFF: Yeah, he gave me a couple of-no, no!

HAPPY: [Cutting in] He told him my Florida idea. WILLY: Don't interrupt. [To Biff] How'd he react to the Florida idea?

BIFF: Dad, will you give me a minute to explain? WILLY: I've been waiting for you to explain since

I sat down here! What happened? He took you into his office and what?

BIFF: Well-I talked. And-and he listened, see WILLY: Famous for the way he listens, y'know. What was his answer?

BIFF: His answer was— [He breaks off, suddenly angry] Dad, you're not letting me tell you what I want to tell you!

WILLY: [Accusing, angered] You didn't see him. did you?

BIFF: I did see him!

WILLY: What'd you insult him or something? You insulted him, didn't you?

BIFF: Listen, will you let me out of it, will you just let me out of it!

HAPPY: What the hell!

WILLY: Tell me what happened! BIFF: [To Happy] I can't talk to him!

[A single trumpet note jurs the ear. The light of green leaves stains the house, which holds the air of night and a dream. Young Bernard enters and knocks on the door of the house

YOUNG BERNARD: [Frantically] Mrs. Loman, Mrs.

Loman!

HAPPY: Tell him what happened! BIFF: [To Happy] Shut up and leave me alone! WILLY: No, no! You had to go and flunk math! BIFF: What math? What're you talking about? YOUNG BERNARD: Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Loman!

[Linda appears in the house, as of old]

WILLY: [Wildly] Math, math, math!

BIFF: Take it easy, Pop!

YOUNG BERNARD: Mrs. Lomani

WILLY: [Furiously] If you hadn't flunked you'd've been set by now!

BIFF: Now, look, I'm gonna tell you what happened, and you're going to listen to me.

YOUNG BERNARD: Mrs. Loman!

BIFF: I waited six hours-

HAPPY: What the hell are you saying?

BIFF: I kept sending in my name but he wouldn't see me. So finally he . . . [He continues unheard as light fades low on the restaurant!

YOUNG BERNARD: Biff flunked math!

LINDA: No!

YOUNG BERNARD: Birnbaum flunked him! They won't graduate him!

LINDA: But they have to. He's gotta go to the university. Where is he? Biff! Biff!

YOUNG BERNARD: No, he left. He went to Grand Central.

LINDA: Grand- You mean he went to Boston! YOUNG BERNARD: Is Uncle Willy in Boston?

LINDA: Oh, maybe Willy can talk to the teacher. Oh, the poor, poor boy!

[Light on house area snaps out]

BIFF: [At the table, now audible, holding up a gold fountain pen] . . . so I'm washed up with Oliver, you understand? Are you listening to me?

WILLY: [At a loss] Yeah, sure. If you hadn't flunked—

BIFF: Flunked what? What're you talking about? WILLY: Don't blame everything on me! I didn't flunk math—you did! What pen?

HAPPY: That was awful dumb, Biff, a pen like that is worth—

WILLY: [Seeing the pen for the first time] You took Oliver's pen?

BIFF: [Weakening] Dad, I just explained it to you. WILLY: You stole Bill Oliver's fountain pen!

BIFF: I didn't exactly steal it! That's just what I've been explaining to you!

HAPPY: He had it in his hand and just then Oliver walked in, so he got nervous and stuck it in his pocket!

WILLY: My God, Biff!

BIFF: I never intended to do it, Dad!

OPERATOR'S VOICE: Standish Arms, good evening! WILLY: [Shouting] I'm not in my room!

BIFF: [Frightened] Dad, what's the matter? [He and Happy stand up]

OPERATOR: Ringing Mr. Loman for you!

WILLY: I'm not there, stop it!

BIFF: [Horrified, gets down on one knee before Willy] Dad, I'll make good, I'll make good. [Willy tries to get to his feet. Biff holds him down] Sit down now.

WILLY: No, you're no good, you're no good for anything.

BIFF: I am, Dad, I'll find something else, you understand? Now don't worry about anything. [He holds up Willy's face] Talk to me, Dad.

OPERATOR: Mr. Loman does not answer. Shall I page him?

WILLY: [Attempting to stand, as though to rush and silence the Operator] No, no, no!

HAPPY: He'll strike something, Pop.

WILLY: No, no . . .

BIFF: [Desperately, standing over Willy] Pop, listen! Listen to me! I'm telling you something good. Oliver talked to his partner about the Florida idea. You listening? He—he talked to his partner, and he came to me . . . I'm going to be all right, you hear? Dad, listen to me, he said it was just a question of the amount!

WILLY: Then you . . . got it? HAPPY: He's gonna be terrific, Pop!

WILLY: [Trying to stand! Then you got it, haven't you? You got it! You got it!

BIFF: [Agonized, holds Willy down] No, no. Look, Pop. I'm supposed to have lunch with them tomorrow. I'm just telling you this so you'll know that I can still make an impression, Pop. And I'll make good somewhere, but I can't go tomorrow, see?

WILLY: Why not? You simply—

BIFF: But the pen, Pop!

WILLY: You give it to him and tell him it was an oversight!

HAPPY: Sure, have lunch tomorrow!

BIFF: I can't say that-

WILLY: You were doing a crossword puzzle and accidentally used his pen!

BIFF: Listen, kid, I took those balls years ago, now I walk in with his fountain pen? That clinches it, don't you see? I can't face him like that! I'll try elsewhere.

PAGE'S VOICE: Paging Mr. Loman! willy: Don't you want to be anything?

BIFF: Pop, how can I go back?

WILLY: You don't want to be anything, is that what's behind it?

BIFF: [Now angry at Willy for not crediting his sympathy] Don't take it that way! You think it was easy walking into that office after what I'd done to him? A team of horses couldn't have dragged me back to Bill Oliver!

WILLY: Then why'd you go?

BIFF: Why did I go? Why did I go! Look at you! Look at what's become of you!

[Off left, The Woman laughs]

WILLY: Biff, you're going to go to that lunch tomorrow, or—

BIFF: I can't go. I've got no appointment!

HAPPY: Biff, for . . . !

WILLY: Are you spiting me?

BIFF: Don't take it that way! Goddammit!

WILLY: [Strikes Biff and falters away from the table] You rotten little louse! Are you spiting me?

THE WOMAN: Someone's at the door, Willy! BIFF: I'm no good, can't you see what I am?

HAPPY: [Separating them] Hey, you're in a restaurant! Now cut it out, both of you! [The girls enter] Hello, girls, sit down.

[The Woman laughs, off left]

MISS FORSYTHE: I guess we might as well. This is Letta.

THE WOMAN: Willy, are you going to wake up? BIFF: [Ignoring Willy] How're ya, miss, sit down. What do you drink?

MISS FORSYTHE: Letta might not be able to stay long.

LETTA: I gotta get up very early tomorrow. I got jury duty. I'm so excited! Were you fellows ever on a jury?

BIFF: No, but I been in front of them! [The girls laugh] This is my father.

LETTA: Isn't he cute? Sit down with us, Pop.

HAPPY: Sit him down, Biff!

BIFF: [Going to him] Come on, slugger, drink us under the table. To hell with it! Come on, sit down, pal.

[On Biff's last insistence, Willy is about to sit] THE WOMAN: [Now urgently] Willy, are you going to answer the door!

[The Woman's call pulls Willy back. He starts right, befuddled]

BIFF: Hey, where are you going? WILLY: Open the door.

BIFF: The door?

WILLY: The washroom . . . the door . . . where's the door?

BIFF: [Leading Willy to the left] Just go straight down.

[Willy moves left]

THE WOMAN: Willy, Willy, are you going to get up, get up, get up, get up?

[Willy exits left]

LETTA: I think it's sweet you bring your daddy along.

MISS FORSYTHE: Oh, he isn't really your father!

you've just seen a prince walk by. A fine, troubled you've just seen a prince walk by. A fine, troubled prince. A hard-working, unappreciated prince. A pal, you understand? A good companion. Always for his boys.

LETTA: That's so sweet.

HAPPY: Well, girls, what's the program? We're wasting time. Come on, Biff. Gather round. Where would you like to go?

BIFF: Why don't you do something for him?

HAPPY: Me!

BIFF: Don't you give a damn for him, Hap?

HAPPY: What're you talking about? I'm the one who-

BIFF: I sense it, you don't give a good goddam about him. [He takes the rolled-up hose from his pocket and puts it on the table in front of Happy] Look what I found in the cellar, for Christ's sake. How can you bear to let it go on?

HAPPY: Me? Who goes away? Who runs off and— BIFF: Yeah, but he doesn't mean anything to you. You could help him—I can't! Don't you understand what I'm talking about? He's going to kill himself, don't you know that?

HAPPY: Don't I know it! Me!

BIFF: Hap, help him! Jesus . . . help him . . . Help me, help me, I can't bear to look at his facel [Ready to weep, he hurries out, up right]

HAPPY: [Starting after him] Where are you going? MISS FORSYTHE: What's he so mad about?

HAPPY: Come on, girls, we'll catch up with him.

MISS FORSYTHE: [4s Happy pushes her out] Say,
I don't like that temper of his!

HAPPY: He's just a little overstrung, he'll be all right!

WILLY: [Off left, as The Woman laughs] Don't answer! Don't answer!

LETTA: Don't you want to tell your father-

HAPPY: No, that's not my father. He's just a guy. Come on, we'll catch Biff, and, honey, we're going to paint this town! Stanley, where's the check! Hey, Stanley!

[They exit. Stanley looks toward left]

STANLEY: [Calling to Happy indignantly] Mr. Loman! Mr. Loman!

[Stanley picks up a chair and follows them off. Knocking is heard off left. The Woman enters, laughing. Willy follows her. She is in a black slip; he is buttoning his shirt. Raw, sensuous music accompanies their speech.

WILLY: Will you stop laughing? Will you stop?

THE WOMAN: Aren't you going to answer the door? He'll wake the whole hotel.

WILLY: I'm not expecting anybody.

THE WOMAN: Whyn't you have another drink, honey, and stop being so damn self-centered?

WILLY: I'm so lonely.

THE WOMAN: You know you ruined me, Willy? From now on, whenever you come to the office, I'll see that you go right through to the buyers. No waiting at my desk any more, Willy. You ruined me.

WILLY: That's nice of you to say that.

THE WOMAN: Gee, you are self-centered! Why so sad? You are the saddest, self-centeredest soul I ever did see-saw. [She laughs. He kisses her] Come on inside, drummer boy. It's silly to be dressing in the middle of the night. [As knocking is heard] Aren't you going to answer the door?

WILLY: They're knocking on the wrong door.

THE WOMAN: But I felt the knocking. And he heard us talking in here. Maybe the hotel's on fire!

WILLY: [His terror rising] It's a mistake.

THE WOMAN: Then tell him to go away!

WILLY: There's nobody there.

THE WOMAN: It's getting on my nerves, Willy. There's somebody standing out there and it's getting on my nerves!

WILLY: [Pushing her away from him] All right, stay in the bathroom here, and don't come out. I think there's a law in Massachusetts about it, so don't come out. It may be that new room clerk. He looked very mean. So don't come out. It's a mistake, there's no fire.

[The knocking is heard again. He takes a few steps away from her, and vanishes into the wing. The light follows him, and now he is facing Young Biff, who carries a suitcase. Biff steps toward him. The music is gone]

BIFF: Why didn't you answer?

WILLY: Biff! What are you doing in Boston?

BIFF: Why didn't you answer? I've been knocking for five minutes, I called you on the phone—

WILLY: I just heard you. I was in the bathroom and had the door shut. Did anything happen home? BIFF: Dad—I let you down.

willy: What do you mean?

BIFF: Dad . . .

WILLY: Biffo, what's this about? [Putting his arm around Biff] Come on, let's go downstairs and get you a malted.

BIFF: Dad, I flunked math.

WILLY: Not for the term?

BIFF: The term. I haven't got enough credits to graduate.

willy: You mean to say Bernard wouldn't give you the answers?

BIFF: He did, he tried, but I only got a sixty-one. WILLY: And they wouldn't give you four points?

BIFF: Birnbaum refused absolutely. I begged him, Pop, but he won't give me those points. You gotta talk to him before they close the school. Because if he saw the kind of man you are, and you just talked to him in your way, I'm sure he'd come through for me. The class came right before practice, see, and I didn't go enough. Would you talk to him? He'd like you, Pop. You know the way you could talk.

WILLY: You're on. We'll drive right back.

BIFF: Oh, Dad, good work! I'm sure he'll change it for you!

WILLY: Go downstairs and tell the clerk I'm checkin' out. Go right down.

BIFF: Yes, sir! See, the reason he hates me, Pop—one day he was late for class so I got up at the blackboard and imitated him. I crossed my eyes and talked with a lithp.

WILLY: [Laughing] You did? The kids like it? BIFF: They nearly died laughing!

WILLY: Yeah? What'd you do?

BIFF: The thquare root of thixthy twee is . . . [Willy bursts out laughing; Biff joins him] And in the middle of it he walked in!

[Willy laughs and The Woman joins in offstage] WILLY: [Without hesitation] Hurry downstairs and—

BIFF: Somebody in there?

WILLY: No, that was next door.

The Woman laughs offstage?

BIFF: Somebody got in your bathroom!

WILLY: No, it's the next room, there's a party— THE WOMAN: [Enters, laughing. She lisps this] Can I come in? There's something in the bathtub, Willy, and it's moving!

[Willy looks at Biff, who is staring openmouthed and horrified at The Woman]

WILLY: Ah—you better go back to your room. They must be finished painting by now. They're painting her room so I let her take a shower here. Go back, go back . . . [He pushes her]

THE WOMAN: [Resisting] But I've got to get dressed, Willy, I can't—

WILLY: Get out of here! Go back, go back . . . [Suddenly striving for the ordinary] This is Miss Francis, Biff, she's a buyer. They're painting her room. Go back, Miss Francis, go back . . .

THE WOMAN: But my clothes, I can't go out naked in the hall!

WILLY: [Pushing her offstage] Get outa here! Go back, go back!

[Biff slowly sits down on his suitcase as the argument continues offstage]

THE WOMAN: Where's my stockings? You promised me stockings, Willy!

WILLY: I have no stockings here!

THE WOMAN: You had two boxes of size nine sheers for me, and I want them!

WILLY: Here, for God's sake, will you get outa

THE WOMAN: [Enters holding a box of stockings] I just hope there's nobody in the hall. That's all I hope. [To Biff] Are you football or baseball?

BIFF: Football.

THE WOMAN: [Angry, humiliated] That's me too. G'night. [She snatches her clothes from Willy, and walks out]

WILLY: [After a pause] Well, better get going, I want to get to the school first thing in the morning. Get my suits out of the closet. I'll get my valise. [Biff doesn't move] What's the matter? [Biff remains motionless, tears falling] She's a buyer. Buys for J. H. Simmons. She lives down the hall—they're painting. You don't imagine-[He breaks off. After a pause] Now listen, pal, she's just a buyer. She sees merchandise in her room and they have to keep it looking just so . . . [Pause. Assuming command] All right, get my suits. [Biff doesn't move] Now stop crying and do as I say. I gave you an order. Biff, I gave you an order! Is that what you do when I give you an order? How dare you cry! [Putting his arm around Biff] Now look, Biff, when you grow up you'll understand about these things. You mustn'tyou mustn't overemphasize a thing like this. I'll see Birnbaum first thing in the morning.

BIFF: Never mind.

WILLY: [Getting down beside Biff] Never mind! He's going to give you those points. I'll see to it.

BIFF: He wouldn't listen to you.

WILLY: He certainly will listen to me. You need those points for the U. of Virginia.

BIFF: I'm not going there.

WILLY: Heh? If I can't get him to change that mark you'll make it up in summer school. You've got all summer to—

BIFF: [His weeping breaking from him] Dad ... WILLY: [Infected by it] Oh, my boy ...

BIFF: Dad . . .

WILLY: She's nothing to me, Biff. I was lonely, I was terribly lonely.

BIFF: You—you gave her Mama's stockings! [His tears break through and he rises to go]

WILLY: [Grabbing for Biff] I gave you an order! BIFF: Don't touch me, you—liar!

WILLY: Apologize for that!

BIFF: You fake! You phony little fake! You fake! [Overcome, he turns quickly and weeping fully goes out with his suitcase. Willy is left on the floor on his knees]

WILLY: I gave you an order! Biff, come back here or I'll beat you! Come back here! I'll whip you!

[Stanley comes quickly from the right and stands in front of Willy]

WILLY: [Shouts at Stanley] I gave you an order . . .

STANLEY: Hey, let's pick it up, pick it up, Mr. Loman. [He helps Willy to his feet] Your boys left with the chippies. They said they'll see you home.

[A second waiter watches some distance away]

WILLY: But we were supposed to have dinner together.

[Music is heard, Willy's theme]

STANLEY: Can you make it?

WILLY: I'll—sure, I can make it. [Suddenly concerned about his clothes] Do I—I look all right?

STANLEY: Sure, you look all right. [He flicks a speck off Willy's lapel]

WILLY: Here-here's a dollar.

STANLEY: Oh, your son paid me. It's all right.

WILLY: [Putting it in Stanley's hand] No, take it. You're a good boy.

STANLEY: Oh, no, you don't have to . . .

WILLY: Here—here's some more, I don't need it any more. [After a slight pause] Tell me—is there a seed store in the neighborhood?

STANLEY: Seeds? You mean like to plant?

[As Willy turns, Stanley slips the money back into his jacket pocket] willy: Yes. Carrots, peas . . .

STANLEY: Well, there's hardware stores on Sixth Avenue, but it may be too late now.

WILLY: [Anxiously] Oh, I'd better hurry. I've got to get some seeds. [He starts off to the right] I've got to get some seeds, right away. Nothing's planted. I don't have a thing in the ground.

[Willy hurries out as the light goes down. Stanley moves over to the right after him, watches him off. The other waiter has been staring at Willy]

STANLEY: [To the waiter] Well, whatta you looking at?

The waiter picks up the chairs and moves off right. Stanley takes the table and follows him. The light fades on this area. There is a long pause, the sound of the flute coming over. The light gradually rises on the kitchen, which is empty. Happy appears at the door of the house, followed by Biff. Happy is carrying a large bunch of long-stemmed roses. He enters the kitchen, looks around for Linda. Not seeing her, he turns to Biff, who is just outside the house door, and makes a gesture with his hands, indicating "Not here, I guess." He looks into the living-room and freezes. Inside, Linda, unseen, is seated, Willy's coat on her lap. She rises ominously and quietly and moves toward Happy, who backs up into the kitchen, afraid]

HAPPY: Hey, what're you doing up? [Linda says nothing but moves toward him implacably] Where's Pop? [He keeps backing to the right, and now Linda is in full view in the doorway to the living-room] Is he sleeping?

LINDA: Where were you?

HAPPY: [Trying to laugh it off] We met two girls, Mom, very fine types. Here, we brought you some flowers. [Offering them to her] Put them in your room, Ma.

[She knocks them to the floor at Biff's feet. He has now come inside and closed the door behind him. She stares at Biff, silent

HAPPY: Now what'd you do that for? Mom, I want you to have some flowers—

LINDA: [Cutting Happy off, violently to Biff] Don't you care whether he lives or dies?

HAPPY: [Going to the stairs] Come upstairs, Biff.

BIFF: [With a flare of disgust, to Happy] Go away from me! [To Linda] What do you mean, lives or dies? Nobody's dying around here, pal.

LINDA: Get out of my sight! Get out of here!

BIFF: I wanna see the boss.

LINDA: You're not going near him!

BIFF: Where is he? [He moves into the living-room and Linda follows]

LINDA: [Shouting after Biff] You invite him for dinner. He looks forward to it all day—[Biff appears in his parents' hedroom, looks around, and exits]—and then you desert him there. There's no stranger you'd do that to!

HAPPY: Why? He had a swell time with us. Listen, when I—[Linda comes back into the kitchen]—desert him I hope I don't outlive the day!

LINDA: Get out of here!

HAPPY: Now look, Mom . . .

LINDA: Did you have to go to women tonight? You and your lousy rotten whores!

[Biff re-enters the kitchen]

HAPPY: Mom, all we did was follow Biff around trying to cheer him up! [To Biff] Boy, what a night you gave me!

LINDA: Get out of here, both of you, and don't come back! I don't want you tormenting him any more. Go on now, get your things together! [To Biff] You can sleep in his apartment. [She starts to pick up the flowers and stops herself] Pick up this stuff, I'm not your maid any more. Pick it up, you bum, you!

[Happy turns his back to her in refusal. Biff slowly moves over and gets down on his knees, picking up the flowers]

LINDA: You're a pair of animals! Not one, not another living soul would have had the cruelty to walk out on that man in a restaurant!

BIFF: [Not looking at her] Is that what he said? LINDA: He didn't have to say anything. He was so humiliated he nearly limped when he came in.

HAPPY: But, Mom, he had a great time with us-BIFF: [Cutting him off violently] Shut up!

[Without another word, Happy goes upstairs]
LINDA: You! You didn't even go in to see if he was all right!

BIFF: [Still on the floor in front of Linda, the flowers in his hand, with self-loathing] No. Didn't. Didn't do a damned thing. How do you like that, heh? Left him babbling in a toilet.

LINDA: You louse. You . . .

BIFF: Now you hit it on the nose! [He gets up, throws the flowers in the wastebasket] The scum of the earth, and you're looking at him!

LINDA: Get out of here!

BIFF: I gotta talk to the boss, Mom. Where is he?
LINDA: You're not going near him. Get out of this

BIFF: [With absolute assurance, determination] No. We're gonna have an abrupt conversation, him and me.

LINDA: You're not talking to him!

[Hammering is heard from outside the house, off right. Biff turns toward the noise]

LINDA: [Suddenly pleading] Will you please leave him alone?

BIFF: What's he doing out there? LINDA: He's planting the garden! BIFF: [Quietly] Now? Oh, my God!

[Biff moves outside, Linda following. The light dies down on them and comes up on the center of the apron as Willy walks into it. He is carrying a flashlight, a hoe, and a handful of seed packets. He raps the top of the hoe sharply to fix it firmly, and then moves to the left, measuring off the distance with his foot. He holds the flashlight to look at the seed packets, reading off the instructions. He is in the blue of night

WILLY: Carrots . . . quarter-inch apart. Rows . . one-foot rows. [He measures it off] One foot. [He puts down a package and measures off] Beets. [He puts down another package and measures again] Lettuce. [He reads the package, puts it down] One foot- [He breaks off as Ben appears at the right and moves slowly down to him] What a proposition, ts, ts. Terrific, terrific. 'Cause she's suffered, Ben, the woman has suffered. You understand me? A man can't go out the way he came in, Ben, a man has got to add up to something. You can't, you can't-[Ben moves toward him as though to interrupt] You gotta consider, now. Don't answer so quick. Remember, it's a guaranteed twenty-thousand dollar proposition. Now look, Ben, I want you to go through the ins and outs of this thing with me. I've got nobody to talk to, Ben, and the woman has suffered, you hear me?

BEN: [Standing still, considering] What's the proposition?

WILLY: It's twenty thousand dollars on the barrel-head. Guaranteed, gilt-edged, you understand?

BEN: You don't want to make a fool of yourself. They might not honor the policy.

WILLY: How can they dare refuse? Didn't I work like a coolie to meet every premium on the nose? And now they don't pay off? Impossible!

BEN: It's called a cowardly thing, William.

WILLY: Why? Does it take more guts to stand here the rest of my life ringing up a zero?

BEN: [Yielding] That's a point, William. [He moves, thinking, turns] And twenty thousand—that is something one can feel with the hand, it is there.

WILLY: [Now assured, with rising power] Oh, Ben, that's the whole beauty of it! I see it like a diamond, shining in the dark, hard and rough, that I can pick up and touch in my hand. Not like—like an appointment! This would not be another damned-fool appointment, Ben, and it changes all the aspects. Because he thinks I'm nothing, see, and so he spites me. But the funeral— [Straightening up] Ben, that funeral will be massive! They'll come from Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire! All the old-timers with the strange license plates—that boy will be thunder-struck, Ben, because he never realized—I am known! Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey—I am known, Ben, and he'll see it with his eyes once and for all. He'll see what I am, Ben! He's in for a shock, that boy!

BEN: [Coming down to the edge of the garden] He'll call you a coward.

WILLY: [Suddenly fearful] No, that would be terrible.

BEN: Yes. And a damned fool.

WILLY: No, no, he mustn't, I won't have that! [He is broken and desperate]

BEN: He'll hate you, William.

[The gay music of the Boys is heard]

WILLY: Oh, Ben, how do we get back to all the great times? Used to be so full of light, and comradeship, the sleigh-riding in winter, and the ruddiness on his cheeks. And always some kind of good news coming up, always something nice coming up ahead. And never even let me carry the valises in the house, and simonizing, simonizing that little red car! Why, why can't I give him something and not have him hate me?

BEN: Let me think about it. [He glances at his watch] I still have a little time. Remarkable proposition, but you've got to be sure you're not making a fool of yourself.

[Ben drifts off upstage and goes out of sight. Biff comes down from the left]

WILLY: [Suddenly conscious of Biff, turns and looks up at him, then begins picking up the packages of seeds in confusion] Where the hell is that seed? [Indignantly] You can't see nothing out here! They boxed in the whole goddam neighborhood!

BIFF: There are people all around here. Don't you realize that?

WILLY: I'm busy. Don't bother me.

BIFF: [Taking the hoe from Willy] I'm saying good-by to you, Pop. [Willy looks at him, silent, unable to move] I'm not coming back any more.

WILLY: You're not going to see Oliver tomorrow? BIFF: I've got no appointment, Dad.

WILLY: He put his arm around you, and you've got no appointment?

BIFF: Pop, get this now, will you? Everytime I've left it's been a fight that sent me out of here. Today I realized something about myself and I tried to explain it to you and I—I think I'm just not smart enough to make any sense out of it for you. To hell with whose fault it is or anything like that. [He takes Willy's arm] Let's just wrap it up, heh? Come on in, we'll tell Mom. [He gently tries to pull Willy to left] WILLY: [Frozen, immobile, with guilt in his voice]

No, I don't want to see her.

BIFF: Come on! [He pulls again, and Willy tries to pull away]

WILLY: [Highly nervous] No, no, I don't want to see her.

BIFF: [Tries to look into Willy's face, as if to find the answer there] Why don't you want to see her?

WILLY: [More harshly now] Don't bother me, will you?

BIFF: What do you mean, you don't want to see her? You don't want them calling you yellow, do you? This isn't your fault; it's me, I'm a bum. Now come inside! [Willy strains to get away] Did you hear what I said to you?

[Willy pulls away and quickly goes by himself into the house. Biff follows]

LINDA: [To Willy] Did you plant, dear?

BIFF: [At the door, to Linda] All right, we had it out. I'm going and I'm not writing any more.

LINDA: [Going to Willy in the kitchen] I think that's the best way, dear. 'Cause there's no use drawing it out, you'll just never get along.

[Willy doesn't respond]

BIFF: People ask where I am and what I'm doing, you don't know, and you don't care. That way it'll be off your mind and you can start brightening up again. All right? That clears it, doesn't it? [Willy is silent, and Biff goes to him] You gonna wish me luck, scout? [He extends his hand] What do you say?

LINDA: Shake his hand, Willy.

WILLY: [Turning to her, seething with hurt] There's no necessity to mention the pen at all, y'know.

BIFF: [Gently] I've got no appointment, Dad.

WILLY: [Erupting fiercely] He put his arm around . . . ?

BIFF: Dad, you're never going to see what I am, so what's the use of arguing? If I strike oil I'll send you a check. Meantime forget I'm alive.

WILLY: [To Linda] Spite, see? BIFF: Shake hands, Dad.

WILLY: Not my hand.

BIFF: I was hoping not to go this way.

WILLY: Well, this is the way you're going. Good-by.

[Biff looks at him a moment, then turns sharply and goes to the stairs]

WILLY: [Stops him with] May you rot in hell if you leave this house!

BIFF: [Turning] Exactly what is it that you want from me?

WILLY: I want you to know, on the train, in the mountains, in the valleys, wherever you go, that you cut down your life for spite!

BIFF: No, no.

WILLY: Spite, spite, is the word of your undoing!

And when you're down and out, remember what did it. When you're rotting somewhere beside the railroad tracks, remember, and don't you dare blame it on me!

BIFF: I'm not blaming it on you!

WILLY: I won't take the rap for this, you hear?
[Happy comes down the stairs and stands on the bottom step, watching]

BIFF: That's just what I'm telling you!

WILLY: [Sinking into a chair at the table, with full accusation] You're trying to put a knife in medon't think I don't know what you're doing!

BIFF: All right, phony! Then let's lay it on the line. [He whips the rubber tube out of his pocket and puts it on the table]

HAPPY: You crazy-

LINDA: Biff! [She moves to grab the hose, but Biff holds it down with his hand]

BIFF: Leave it there! Don't move it!
WILLY: [Not looking at it] What is that?
BIFF: You know goddam well what that is.

WILLY: [Caged, wanting to escape] I never saw that.

BIFF: You saw it. The mice didn't bring it into the cellar! What is this supposed to do, make a hero out of you? This supposed to make me sorry for you?

WILLY: Never heard of it.

BIFF: There'll be no pity for you, you hear it? No pity!

WILLY: [To Linda] You hear the spite!

BIFF: No, you're going to hear the truth—what you are and what I am!

LINDA: Stop it! WILLY: Spite!

HAPPY: [Coming down toward Biff] You cut it now!

BIFF: [To Happy] The man don't know who we are! The man is gonna know! [To Willy] We never told the truth for ten minutes in this house!

HAPPY: We always told the truth!

BIFF: [Turning on him] You big blow, are you the assistant buyer? You're one of the two assistants to the assistant, aren't you?

HAPPY: Well, I'm practically-

BIFF: You're practically full of it! We all are! And I'm through with it. [To Willy] Now hear this, Willy, this is me.

WILLY: I know you!

BIFF: You know why I had no address for three months? I stole a suit in Kansas City and I was in jail. [To Linda, who is sobbing] Stop crying. I'm through with it.

[Linda turns away from them, her hands covering her face]

WILLY: I suppose that's my fault!

BIFF: I stole myself out of every good job since high school!

WILLY: And whose fault is that?

BIFF: And I never got anywhere because you blew me so full of hot air I could never stand taking orders from anybody! That's whose fault it is!

WILLY: I hear that! LINDA: Don't, Biff!

BIFF: It's goddam time you heard that! I had to be boss big shot in two weeks, and I'm through with WILLY: Then hang yourself! For spite, hang yourself!

BIFF: No! Nobody's hanging himself, Willy! I ran down eleven flights with a pen in my hand today. And suddenly I stopped, you hear me? And in the middle of that office building, do you hear this? I stopped in the middle of that building and I saw—the sky. I saw the things that I love in this world. The work and the food and time to sit and smoke. And I looked at the pen and said to myself, what the hell am I grabbing this for? Why am I trying to become what I don't want to be? What am I doing in an office, making a contemptuous, begging fool of myself, when all I want is out there, waiting for me the minute I say I know who I am! Why can't I say that, Willy? [He tries to make Willy face him, but Willy pulls away and moves to the left]

WILLY: [With hatred, threateningly] The door of your life is wide open!

BIFF: Pop! I'm a dime a dozen, and so are you!
WILLY: [Turning on him now in an uncontrolled outburst] I am not a dime a dozen! I am Willy Loman, and you are Biff Loman!

[Biff starts for Willy, but is blocked by Happy. In his fury, Biff seems on the verge of attacking his father]

BIFF: I am not a leader of men, Willy, and neither are you. You were never anything but a hard-working drummer who landed in the ash can like all the rest of them! I'm one dollar an hour, Willy! I tried seven states and couldn't raise it. A buck an hour! Do you gather my meaning! I'm not bringing home any prizes any more, and you're going to stop waiting for me to bring them home!

WILLY: [Directly to Biff] You vengeful, spiteful mut!

[Biff breaks from Happy. Willy, in fright, starts up the stairs. Biff grabs him]

BIFF: [At the peak of his fury] Pop, I'm nothing! I'm nothing, Pop. Can't you understand that? There's no spite in it any more. I'm just what I am, that's all.

[Biff's fury has spent itself, and he breaks down, sobbing, holding on to Willy, who dumbly fumbles for Biff's face]

WILLY: [Astonished] What're you doing? What're you doing? [To Linda] Why is he crying?

BIFF: [Crying, broken] Will you let me go, for Christ's sake? Will you take that phony dream and burn it before something happens? [Struggling to contain himself, he pulls away and moves to the stairs] I'll go in the morning. Put him—put him to bed. [Exhausted, Biff moves up the stairs to his room]

WILLY: [After a long pause, astonished, elevated] Isn't that—isn't that remarkable? Biff—he likes me! LINDA: He loves you, Willy!

HAPPY: [Deeply moved] Always did, Pop.

WILLY: Oh, Biff! [Staring wildly] He cried! Cried to me. [He is choking with his love, and now cries out his promise] That boy—that boy is going to be magnificent!

[Ben appears in the light just outside the kitchen]

BEN: Yes, outstanding, with twenty thousand behind him.

LINDA: [Sensing the racing of his mind, fearfully, carefully] Now come to bed, Willy. It's all settled now.

WILLY: [Finding it difficult not to rush out of the house] Yes, we'll sleep. Come on. Go to sleep, Hap. BEN: And it does take a great kind of a man to crack the jungle.

[In accents of dread, Ben's idyllic music starts up]

HAPPY: [His arm around Linda] I'm getting married, Pop, don't forget it. I'm changing everything. I'm gonna run that department before the year is up. You'll see, Mom. [He kisses her]

BEN: The jungle is dark but full of diamonds, Willy.

[Willy turns, moves, listening to Ben]

LINDA: Be good. You're both good boys, just act that way, that's all.

HAPPY: 'Night, Pop. [He goes upstairs]

LINDA: [To Willy] Come, dear.

BEN: [With greater force] One must go in to fetch a diamond out.

WILLY: [To Linda, as he moves slowly along the edge of the kitchen, toward the door] I just want to get settled down, Linda. Let me sit alone for a little.

LINDA: [Almost uttering her fear] I want you upstairs.

WILLY: [Taking her in his arms] In a few minutes, Linda. I couldn't sleep right now. Go on, you look awful tired. [He kisses her]

BEN: Not like an appointment at all. A diamond is rough and hard to the touch.

WILLY: Go on now. I'll be right up.

LINDA: I think this is the only way, Willy.

WILLY: Sure, it's the best thing.

BEN: Best thing!

WILLY: The only way. Everything is gonna be—go on, kid, get to bed. You look so tired.

LINDA: Come right up.

WILLY: Two minutes.

[Linda goes into the living-room, then reappears in her bedroom. Willy moves just outside the kitchen door]

WILLY: Loves me. [Wonderingly] Always loved me. Isn't that a remarkable thing? Ben, he'll worship me for it!

BEN: [With promise] It's dark there, but full of diamonds.

WILLY: Can you imagine that magnificence with twenty thousand dollars in his pocket?

LINDA: [Calling from her room] Willy! Come up! willy: [Calling into the kitchen] Yes! Yes. Coming! It's very smart, you realize that, don't you, sweetheart? Even Ben sees it. I gotta go, baby. 'By! 'By! [Going over to Ben, almost dancing] Imagine? When the mail comes he'll be ahead of Bernard again!

BEN: A perfect proposition all around.

WILLY: Did you see how he cried to me? Oh, if I could kiss him, Ben!

BEN: Time, William, time!

WILLY: Oh, Ben, I always knew one way or another we were gonna make it, Biff and I!

BEN: [Looking at his watch] The boat. We'll be late, [He moves slowly off into the darkness]

WILLY: [Elegiacally, turning to the house] Now when you kick off, boy, I want a seventy-yard boot, and get right down the field under the ball, and when you hit, hit low and hit hard, because it's important, boy. [He swings around and faces the audience] There's all kinds of important people in the stands, and the first thing you know . . [Suddenly realizing he is alone] Ben! Ben, where do I . . .? [He makes a sudden movement of search] Ben, how do I . . .?

LINDA: [Calling] Willy, you coming up?

WILLY: [Uttering a gasp of fear, whirling about as if to quiet her] Sh! [He turns around as if to find his way; sounds, faces, voices, seem to he swarming in upon him and he flicks at them, crying] Sh! Sh! [Suddenly music, faint and high, stops him. It rises in intensity, almost to an unbearable scream. He goes up and down on his toes, and rushes off around the house] Shhh!

LINDA: Willy?

[There is no answer. Linda waits. Biff gets up off his bed. He is still in his clothes. Happy sits up. Biff stands listening]

LINDA: [With real feur] Willy, answer me! Willy!

[There is the sound of a car starting and moving away at full speed]

LINDA: No!

BIFF: [Rushing down the stairs] Pop!

(As the car speeds off, the music crashes down in a frenzy of sound, which becomes the soft pulsation of a single cello string. Biff slowly returns to his bedroom. He and Happy gravely don their jackets. Linda slowly walks out of her room. The music has developed into a dead march. The leaves of day are appearing over everything. Charley and Bernard, somberly dressed, appear and knock on the kitchen door. Biff and Happy slowly descend the stairs to the kitchen as Charley and Bernard enter. All stop a moment when Linda, in clothes of mourning, bearing a little bunch of roses, comes through the draped doorway into the kitchen. She goes to Charley and takes his arm. Now all move toward the audience, through the wall-line of the kitchen. At the limit of the apron, Linda lays down the flowers, kneels, and sits back on her heels. All stare down at the grave]

REQUIEM

CHARLEY: It's getting dark, Linda.

[Linda doesn't react. She stares at the grave]
BIFF: How about it, Mom? Better get some rest, heh? They'll be closing the gate soon.

[Linda makes no move. Pause]

HAPPY: [Deeply angered] He had no right to do that. There was no necessity for it. We would've helped him.

CHARLEY: [Grunting] Hmmm.

BIFF: Come along, Mom.

LINDA: Why didn't anybody come?

CHARLEY: It was a very nice funeral.

LINDA: But where are all the people he knew? Maybe they blame him.

CHARLEY: Naa. It's a rough world, Linda. They wouldn't blame him.

LINDA: I can't understand it. At this time especially. First time in thirty-five years we were just about free and clear. He only needed a little salary. He was even finished with the dentist.

CHARLEY: No man only needs a little salary.

LINDA: I can't understand it.

BIFF: There were a lot of nice days. When he'd come home from a trip; or on Sundays, making the stoop; finishing the cellar; putting on the new porch; when he built the extra bathroom; and put up the garage. You know something, Charley, there's more of him in that front stoop than in all the sales he ever made.

CHARLEY: Yeah. He was a happy man with a batch of cement.

LINDA: He was so wonderful with his hands.

BIFF: He had the wrong dreams. All, all, wrong. HAPPY: [Almost ready to fight Biff] Don't say that!

BIFF: He never knew who he was.

CHARLEY: [Stopping Happy's movement and reply. To Biff] Nobody dast blame this man. You don't understand: Willy was a salesman. And for a salesman, there is no rock bottom to the life. He don't put a bolt to a nut, he don't tell you the law or give you medicine. He's a man way out there in the blue, riding on a smile and a shoeshine. And when they start not smiling back—that's an earthquake. And then you get yourself a couple of spots on your hat, and you're finished. Nobody dast blame this man. A salesman is got to dream, boy. It comes with the territory.

BIFF: Charley, the man didn't know who he was. HAPPY: [Infuriated] Don't say that!

BIFF: Why don't you come with me, Happy?

HAPPY: I'm not licked that easily. I'm staying right in this city, and I'm gonna beat this racket! [He looks at Biff, his chin set] The Loman Brothers! BIFF: I know who I am, kid.

HAPPY: All right, boy. I'm gonna show you and everybody else that Willy Loman did not die in vain. He had a good dream. It's the only dream you can have—to come out number-one man. He fought it out here, and this is where I'm gonna win it for him.

BIFF: [With a hopeless glance at Happy, bends toward his mother] Let's go, Mom.

LINDA: I'll be with you in a minute. Go on, Charley. [He hesitates] I want to, just for a minute. I never had a chance to say good-by.

[Charley moves away, followed by Happy. Biff remains a slight distance up and left of Linda. She sits there, summoning herself. The flute begins, not far away, playing behind her speech]

LINDA: Forgive me, dear. I can't cry. I don't know what it is, but I can't cry. I don't understand it. Why did you ever do that? Help me, Willy, I can't cry. It seems to me that you're just on another trip. I keep expecting you. Willy, dear. I can't cry. Why did you do it? I search and search and I search, and I can't understand it, Willy. I made the last payment on the house today. Today, dear. And there'll be nobody home. [A sob rises in her throat] We're free and clear. [Sobbing more fully, released] We're free. [Biff comes slowly toward her] We're free . . . We're free . . .

[Biff lifts her to her feet and moves out up right with her in his arms. Linda sobs quietly. Bernard and Charley come together and follow them, followed by Happy. Only the music of the flute is left on the darkening stage as over the house the hard towers of the apartment buildings rise into sharp focus, and

A REPRESENTATIVE LIST OF MODERN PLAYS

The following appendix is intended to supplement this anthology with a selected list of historically important plays. Many of these titles have already been mentioned or discussed in the introductions, but they are repeated here for the convenience of the reader. The editor makes no claim of completeness for this list. The informed reader, the student, and his instructor will undoubtedly want to add their own preferences. The starting date for this volume of A Treasury of the Theatre is more or less arbitrarily taken to be 1875. The forerunners of the modern playwrights are represented in the first volume of the anthology, which begins with the period of Greek classicism and brings us to Ibsen's early career as a romanticist.

SCANDINAVIAN DRAMA

- BJÖRNSTJERNE BJÖRNSON: Beyond Human Power, I and II (I, 1883; II, 1895). The first part, a tragedy of a minister's struggle with faith in a psychological situation; the

- second, a problem play about the conflict between capital and labor.
- August Strindberg: The Father (1887). See page 75.
 - Miss Julie (1888). A long, naturalistic oneact drama about the conflict of the sexes and the classes; the tragedy of a repressed young woman in the grip of the sexual instinct.
 - Comrades (1888). A saturnine comedy about the "equality of the sexes" and about a woman's desire to elevate herself above her husband, who mistakenly treats her as a "comrade" and tries to give her a victory that she has not earned with her own talents.
 - The Creditor (1890). A long, psychological one-act treatment of feminine parasitism and of a scorned first husband's vengeance by the application of suggestion to her second husband.
 - The Link (1893). A divorce drama in which the compulsive recriminations of husband and wife deprive them of the custody of their child.
 - There Are Crimes and Crimes (1899). See page 328.
